QUESTIONS PRESENTED

In Boumediene v. Bush, this Court held that the Constitution's extraterritorial application "turn[s] on objective factors and practical concerns," not a "formal sovereignty-based test." 553 U.S. 723, 764 (2008). That holding is consistent with Justice Kennedy's concurrence two decades earlier in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), rejecting four Justices' formalist approach to extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.

The questions presented are:

1. Does a formalist or functionalist analysis govern the extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unjustified deadly force, as applied to a cross-border shooting of an unarmed Mexican citizen in an enclosed area controlled by the United States?

2. May qualified immunity be granted or denied based on facts—such as the victim's legal status—unknown to the officer at the time of the incident?

LIST OF PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS

The following petitioners were plaintiffs in the district court and appellants in the court of appeals: Jesus C. Hernández, individually and as the surviving father of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, and as successor-in-interest to the estate of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca; and Maria Guadalupe Güereca Bentacour, individually and as the surviving mother of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, and as successor-in-interest to the estate of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca.

Respondent Jesus Mesa, Jr. was a defendant in the district court and an appellee in the court of appeals.

The following entities and individuals were parties in two appeals that were consolidated by the court of appeals with the appeal that gave rise to this petition: the United States of America, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, the U.S. Border Patrol, the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency, the U.S. Department of Justice, Ramiro Cordero, and Victor M. Manjarrez, Jr. Those two appeals are not the subject of this petition, and these entities and individuals are not respondents here. (As a courtesy, a copy of this petition has been sent to the Solicitor General.)

Reasons for granting the petition 13

I. This case presents an ideal vehicle to clarify the correct approach to the Constitution's extraterritorial application after Boumediene—a question that has bedeviled courts and commentators. 13

II. The Fifth Circuit's qualified-immunity holding creates a circuit split and is in serious tension with the purposes of qualified immunity as articulated in this Court's cases. 23

INTRODUCTION

Seven years ago, in Boumediene v. Bush, this Court held that "de jure sovereignty" is not and has never been "the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution" because "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." 553 U.S. 723, 764 (2008). That "century-old" functionalist approach applies across a range of constitutional provisions. Id. at 759. And it is consistent with Justice Kennedy's concurrence in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, in which he focused on practical concerns in deciding whether to apply the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement abroad. 494 U.S. 259, 275-78 (1990).

Disregarding Boumediene's functionalist approach, the en banc Fifth Circuit in this case concluded that the Constitution affords no protection to an unarmed teenager in a confined area of exclusive U.S. control who was shot to death at close range, without justification, by a U.S. Border Patrol agent standing on U.S. soil. Eschewing any consideration of pragmatic factors, the decision below relied on the formalist analysis of four Justices in Verdugo-Urquidez to hold that the Fourth Amendment's protection against excessive deadly force did not apply because the teenager was a Mexican citizen with no "significant voluntary connection" to the U.S., and the agent did not fire his weapon until the boy had crossed onto Mexican soil. App. 4a. If left standing, the Fifth Circuit's decision will create a unique no-man's land—a law-free zone in which U.S. agents can kill innocent civilians with impunity.

The Fifth Circuit achieves that result by adopting a reading of Verdugo-Urquidez that "cannot be squared with [this] Court's later holding in Boumediene." App. 31a (Dennis, J.). By contrast, the nation's other leading border circuit, the Ninth Circuit, has adopted a more flexible approach that follows Boumediene's functional inquiry. Ibrahim v. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 669 F.3d 983, 997 (9th Cir. 2012). The Ninth Circuit's divergent precedent has recently been applied to the facts of an indistinguishable cross-border shooting and produced a diametrically opposite result. See Rodriguez v. Swartz, No. 14-cv-02251 (D. Ariz. July 9, 2015) (reproduced at 153a). This Court should grant certiorari "to clarify the reach of Boumediene and apply Justice Kennedy's functional test" to these all-too-frequently "recurring" facts. App. 33a, 43a (Prado, J.). This case provides an ideal vehicle for the Court "to decide whether its broad statements in Boumediene apply to our border with Mexico and to provide clarity to law enforcement, civilians, and the federal courts tasked with interpreting the Court's seminal opinions on the extraterritorial reach of constitutional rights." App. 33a (Prado, J.).

This Court should also grant certiorari to resolve an important question concerning qualified immunity, which protects officers from suit if they acted reasonably "in light of clearly established law and the information [they] possessed" at the time, Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 641 (1987): May qualified immunity be granted or denied based on facts—such as a person's legal status—that would not have been known to "a reasonable officer on the scene," but could be discovered only with "the 20/20 vision of hindsight," Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396 (1989)?

The answer to that question is no, as the Ninth Circuit correctly held in Moreno v. Baca, 431 F.3d 633, 642 (9th Cir. 2005). By reaching the opposite conclusion with respect to the plaintiff's parallel Fifth Amendment due-process claim, the decision below brings the Fifth Circuit into direct conflict with the Ninth Circuit and other circuits, and undermines the purposes of qualified immunity as described by this Court. If the Fifth Circuit's approach is allowed to flourish, officers guilty of unjustified conduct may be accorded immunity based on facts of which they were unaware. At the same time, officers otherwise deserving of immunity may be forced to stand trial because of later-discovered facts. In both scenarios, immunity would turn on the "the fortuity of the circumstances," not the nature of the conduct. Lee v. Ferraro, 284 F.3d 1188, 1200 (11th Cir. 2002).

This case thus presents the Court with a golden opportunity to decide two questions of pressing national importance, both of which are cleanly teed up. Absent this Court's intervention, Border Patrol agents in Texas will face one set of rules, while those operating in California and Arizona will face a very different set of rules, with agents in New Mexico left to wonder on which side of the divide their circuit will fall. This Court should put an end to this intolerable state of affairs, bring the law into conformity, and make clear that our border with Mexico is not an on/off switch for the Constitution's protections against the unreasonable use of deadly force.

JURISDICTION

The en banc court of appeals entered its judgment on April 24, 2015. App. 1a. This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATEMENT

A. Factual Background

1. On a summer day in 2010, a fifteen-year-old boy named Sergio Hernández was playing with three friends in the concrete culvert separating El Paso, Texas and Juarez, Mexico. App. 146a. Once the flowing Rio Grande, the culvert splits the cities like a cement river, with the invisible borderline running through it. To one side, toward El Paso, is a banked incline that leads to an 18-foot fence built by the U.S. as "part of a 650-mile, $2.8 billion border wall." Andrew Rice, Life on the Line, N.Y. Times Magazine, July 28, 2011, http://nyti.ms/1H7VvX9; see App. 146a. To the other side, toward Juarez, is another incline leading to a wall topped with a guardrail. In between is a "concrete bank where the now-dry, 33-feet (10-meter) wide Rio Grande is." Christopher Sherman & Olivia Torres, Mexico teen killed by US Border Patrol, anger high, Scranton Times Tribune, June 9, 2010, http://bit.ly/1JJkCW9. Overhead, "a railroad bridge linking the two nations" spans the culvert. Id. A photograph of the bridge and the culvert can be found at http://bit.ly/1IHkVPZ and in the appendix at 181a.

Like countless children before them, Sergio and his friends were playing a game in which they dared each other to run up the culvert's northern incline, touch the U.S. fence, and then scamper back down to the bottom. App. 146a. Because they were not trying to smuggle themselves into the U.S., the boys chose a site in plain view of the Paso del Norte Port of Entry—one of the busiest border crossings in the United States. App. 146a. And because the boys meant no harm, they were unarmed. App. 147a.

While the boys were playing, a U.S. border guard patrolling the culvert on bicycle seized one of them as they ran down the ramp. App. 146-47a. The other boys fled back into Mexico, with Sergio running past the agent, Jesus Mesa, toward a pillar beneath the bridge on the Mexican side of the culvert. Id. Within seconds, Agent Mesa drew his firearm, aimed it at Sergio, and shot him in the head, just next to his eye. Id. Neither Agent Mesa nor any of the other Border Patrol agents who swarmed the scene offered the boy medical aid of any kind; instead, they got back on their bikes and left. App. 147a. Sergio died on the spot. Id.

Although just 60 feet separated Sergio from Agent Mesa at the time of the shooting, Sergio was formally in Mexican territory when he was killed, while Mesa was formally in the United States. App. 147a. CNN, Youth fatally shot by border agent, June 10, 2010, http://cnn.it/1gjK1t4. And Sergio, it turned out, was a Mexican citizen, App. 145a—a fact about which Agent Mesa could not have known when he pulled the trigger—marking "the second death of a Mexican at the hands of Border Patrol officers in less than two weeks." Sherman & Torres, Mexico teen killed by US Border Patrol.

2. One day after the shooting, federal authorities began claiming that Agent Mesa shot Sergio in self-defense. The FBI's El Paso Division put out a press release entitled "Assault on Federal Officer Investigated." FBI El Paso Press Release, June 8, 2010, http://1.usa.gov/1JUAdQ5. The statement asserted that Mesa "responded to a group of suspected illegal aliens being smuggled into the U.S. from Mexico," and Sergio "began to throw rocks" at Mesa from across the border. Id. According to the FBI, Mesa fired his gun only after he "gave verbal commands" for Sergio to "stop and retreat," and Sergio and the other boys "surrounded the agent and continued to throw rocks at him." Id.; see also App. 147a.

But two days later, "several cellphone videos" surfaced that "show[ed] a different story." Bob Ortega & Rob O'Dell, Deadly border agents incident cloaked in silence, Arizona Republic, Dec. 16, 2013, http://bit.ly/1bHMq6p; see CNN, Youth fatally shot by border agent, June 10, 2010, http://cnn.it/1gjK1t4. The videos show that "Mesa wasn't surrounded" by the boys when he fired his weapon, nor did Sergio throw any rocks at him. Ortega & O'Dell, Deadly border agents incident cloaked in silence. In one video, Sergio is "visible, peeping out from behind a pillar beneath a train trestle. He sticks his head out; Mesa fires; and the boy falls to the ground, dead." Id. As CNN reported at the time, the video "contradicts [the FBI's] account." CNN, Youth fatally shot by border agent.

Even before the videos came to light, the shooting sparked outrage on both sides of the border. In Mexico, the government condemned it as unjustified. Id. "The growing frequency of this kind of event," Mexico's Foreign Ministry lamented, "reflects a troubling trend in the use of excessive force by some border authorities." Tim Padgett, After Teen's Death, a Border Intifadeh?, TIME, June 10, 2010, http://ti.me/1CmTbiz. The Ministry cited records showing that "the number of Mexicans who ha[d] been killed or wounded by U.S. border authorities ha[d] increased from five in 2008 to 12 in 2009," and then to 17 in the first half of 2010. CNN, Youth fatally shot by border agent.

3. In the aftermath of Sergio's death, criminal prosecutors in both the U.S. and Mexico investigated the shooting. But to no avail: The Justice Department lacked jurisdiction to prosecute under federal criminal civil-rights laws and the federal murder statute because Sergio was on foreign soil at the time of his death and was not a U.S. citizen. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 242 & 1119; DOJ Press Release, Federal Officials Close Investigation into the Death of Sergio Hernandez-Guereca, Apr. 27, 2012, http://1.usa.gov/1Cu6qy0 (explaining that DOJ lacked jurisdiction). And Mexican prosecutors, though they had jurisdiction to prosecute Mesa as a formal matter, could not do so in practice: After the State of Chihuahua issued a murder warrant for Mesa's arrest, the U.S. refused a request for extradition. Marisela Lozano, Chihuahua officials seek extradition of border agent, El Paso Times, May 4, 2012, http://bit.ly/1HkFZcF.

That left the Border Patrol to handle any discipline internally. Federal regulations restrict the use of deadly force by Border Patrol agents, requiring that an agent first have "reasonable grounds to believe that such force is necessary to protect [himself or herself] or other persons from the imminent danger of death or serious physical injury." 8 C.F.R. § 287.8(a)(2); see also id. § 287.8(a)(1)(iii). Customs and Border Protection (CBP) has incorporated this requirement into its use-of-force policies—policies the agency did not make publicly available until recently, in response to public outcry. See U.S. Customs & Border Prot., HB 4500-01C, Use of Force Policy, Guidelines and Procedures Handbook, at 3 (May 2014), http://1.usa.gov/1nADcFv; Ortega & O'Dell, Deadly border agents incident cloaked in silence.

Despite these restrictions, Border Patrol agents have used deadly force in a number of "highly questionable" instances in recent years, and have done so with impunity. Id. An investigation conducted by the Arizona Republic revealed that agents and CBP officers "killed at least 42 people" from 2005 to 2013, "all but four of which [were killed] along or near the southwest border." Id. Yet, "[i]n none of the 42 deaths is any agent or officer publicly known to have faced consequences—not from the Border Patrol, not from [CBP] or Homeland Security, not from the Department of Justice, and not, ultimately, from criminal or civil courts." Id. "Internal discipline," moreover, "is a black hole." Id.

This "lack of accountability" and "culture of secrecy about agents' use of deadly force" has persisted notwithstanding increased outside scrutiny. Id. In 2013, the Police Executive Research Forum—"an independent group of law enforcement experts" commissioned by CBP—studied 67 shootings that occurred from 2010 to 2012 (nearly a third of them fatal). Brian Bennett, Border Patrol absolves itself in dozens of cases of lethal force, L.A. Times, June 15, 2015, http://lat.ms/1HK7SN5. The report "criticized the Border Patrol for a 'lack of diligence' in investigating its deadly incidents," id., and concluded that "[t]oo many cases do not appear to meet the test of objective reasonableness with regard to the use of deadly force." U.S. Customs and Border Prot., Use of Force Review: Cases and Policies, at 6 (Feb. 2013), http://1.usa.gov/1nKOBQS.

Rather than reform its ways, the Border Patrol first tried to keep the report secret, refusing even to give Congress a copy until it was leaked to the Los Angeles Times. Bennett, Border Patrol absolves itself in dozens of cases of lethal force. Then, under pressure to act, the agency conducted a separate review of the same 67 cases—only this time internally—and in June 2015 "absolved agents of misconduct in all but three cases, which are still pending." Id. Keeping to "its tradition of closing ranks around its paramilitary culture," the Border Patrol disciplined only two agents for these shootings—and "[b]oth received oral reprimands." Id.

B. Procedural History

Six months after Sergio Hernández's death, in early 2011, his parents sued Agent Mesa in federal district court in Texas, alleging that the agent violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. App. 151a. Jurisdiction over these claims was based on 28 U.S.C. § 1331.[1]

Mesa moved to dismiss, arguing that Sergio lacked any constitutional protection because he "was an alien without voluntary attachments to the United States" who was "standing in Mexico when he was killed." App. 113-14a. Mesa did not attempt to justify his actions or to explain why they were reasonable in light of the circumstances, nor did he claim to have had knowledge—at the time of the shooting—of the facts that, in his view, were constitutionally dispositive: Sergio's citizenship, the nature of his attachments to the U.S., and his precise location along the border.

The district court's decision. The district court dismissed all claims. App. 119a, 139-40a. It concluded that the Constitution's deadly-force protections, as applied to non-citizens like Sergio, stop at the border. App. 116-18a. The district court declined to follow this Court's decision in Boumediene, calling it "inapposite" because it "says nothing of the Fourth Amendment." App. 114a. Applying a formalistic test instead, the court declined to grant constitutional protection because Sergio "was standing underneath the Mexican side of the Paso Del Norte Bridge when Agent Mesa shot him." App. 131a. The court also dismissed the Fifth Amendment claim. App. 118a.

---

[1] The family also brought several tort claims against the United States. Those claims are not at issue in this petition, and the United States is not a respondent here.

The Fifth Circuit panel's decision. A divided panel of the Fifth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part. App. 54-108a. It fractured badly on the claims against Agent Mesa, and held that the Fifth Amendment (but not the Fourth Amendment) applies. App. 71-89a. The court further held that Mesa is not entitled to qualified immunity because "[n]o reasonable officer" would think it permissible to kill an unarmed teenager just because he happened to be an alien with no significant voluntary connections to the U.S. who was standing outside the border—facts Mesa did not know when he pulled the trigger. App. 103a.

On the extraterritoriality question, two of the judges rejected the district court's formalistic analysis, finding that it "no longer represents the Supreme Court's view" after Boumediene, which held that "practical considerations" and objective factors "govern[] the application of constitutional principles abroad." App. 66a. Judge Prado explained that Boumediene "appears to repudiate the formalistic reasoning of Verdugo-Urquidez's sufficient connections test" in favor of the "'practical and functional' test articulated in Justice Kennedy's [Verdugo-Urquidez] concurrence." App. 76-77a. And Judge Dennis stressed that a formalistic reading of Verdugo-Urquidez "cannot be squared with the Court's later holding in Boumediene." App. 105a. Judge DeMoss, by contrast, distinguished Boumediene on its facts and took the view that the Constitution should not apply "because there is a border between the United States and Mexico," and Agent Mesa shot Sergio after he ran across it. App. 107-8a.

The en banc Fifth Circuit's decision. Rehearing the case en banc, the Fifth Circuit produced a per curiam opinion that masked deep divisions among the judges, many of whom wrote separately. Because the court was "divided on the question whether Agent Mesa's conduct violated the Fifth Amendment," and "[r]easonable minds can differ" about whether Boumediene's functional approach requires applying constitutional protection here, the court chose not to decide the Fifth Amendment question. App. 5-6a. Instead, "avail[ing] itself of the latitude afforded by Pearson v. Callahan," 555 U.S. 223 (2009), the court held that Mesa is entitled to qualified immunity even assuming he violated the Fifth Amendment because its applicability "was not clearly established, under these facts, in 2010." App. 4a, 7a. The court acknowledged that Boumediene represents the "strongest authority for the plaintiffs," but determined that the case does not speak "with the directness that the 'clearly established' standard requires." App. 5-6a.

As to the Fourth Amendment, the court reached the merits and held that "pursuant to United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez," Sergio "cannot assert a claim under the Fourth Amendment" because he was "a Mexican citizen who had no 'significant voluntary connection' to the United States" and "was on Mexican soil at the time he was shot." App. 4a. The court did not discuss any other factor, including whether applying the Fourth Amendment in this case would be "impracticable and anomalous"—a factor that Justice Kennedy found critical in Verdugo-Urquidez when he concluded that "the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement should not apply in Mexico as it does in this country." See 494 U.S. at 278.

Judge Prado concurred, joined by Judges Dennis and Graves "except to the extent that [his opinion] adopts the en banc court's reasons for denying the Fourth Amendment claim." App. 50a (Graves, J.); see also App. 31a (Dennis, J.). Although Judge Prado adhered to his previous position on the Fifth Amendment, he reversed course on qualified immunity, apparently persuaded that "[t]he depth of [the court's] disagreement about the meaning of Boumediene, Verdugo-Urquidez, and [Johnson v.] Eisentrager," 339 U.S. 763 (1950), underscores the law's uncertainty. App. 42a.

In separate opinions, Judges Dennis and Graves expressed disagreement with the en banc court's formalistic Fourth Amendment test. Judge Dennis reiterated his view that such an approach conflicts with Boumediene, App. 31a, while Judge Graves agreed that the Fourth Amendment claim "ha[s] force," but disagreed "that this court should forgo the adjudication" of that claim—effectively dissenting from the per curiam opinion on this point. App. 50a.

Judge Jones, responding to her colleagues' "suggest[ion]" that "the Supreme Court take . . . up" the case, App. 22a, wrote to provide her views, which were shared by Judges Smith, Clement, and Owen. App. 7-30a She criticized the en banc "compromise" opinion for ducking the Fifth Amendment question, saying that it "simply delays the day of reckoning." App. 7a. Taking a formalistic position, she thought it "clear that United States constitutional rights do not extend to aliens who (a) lack any connection to the United States and (b) are injured on foreign soil," and thus would "resolve this appeal on the first prong of qualified immunity analysis." Id. Although she acknowledged that Boumediene's functionalist approach could "ultimately be extended to determine the extraterritorial reach" of the constitutional provisions at issue here, she concluded that "this court may not step ahead of the Supreme Court." App. 19a.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

I. This case presents an ideal vehicle to clarify the correct approach to the Constitution's extraterritorial application after Boumediene—a question that has bedeviled courts and commentators.

This Court held in Boumediene that "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." 553 U.S. at 764. Yet the Fifth Circuit refused to heed that mandate. It did not consider any practical concerns and applied formalism alone. Relying exclusively on Verdugo-Urquidez, the Fifth Circuit held that Sergio Hernández lacks a constitutional claim because he was a Mexican citizen with no "significant voluntary connection" to the U.S. and "was on Mexican soil at the time he was shot." App. 4a. That holding contravenes Boumediene and diverges with the Ninth Circuit's extraterritoriality precedent—precedent that has already been applied to indistinguishable facts and produced conflicting results. This Court should take the opportunity "to clarify the reach of Boumediene" and apply a functionalist analysis to these "recurring" facts. App. 33a, 43a (Prado, J.).

A. Boumediene's functionalist approach dates back more than 100 years. It is embodied in cases arising out of different continents and centuries and concerning a wide array of constitutional provisions. Taken together, these cases repudiate the Fifth Circuit's strict sovereignty-based rule.

At "the dawn of the 20th century," in what came to be known as the Insular Cases, this Court began its extraterritoriality jurisprudence by addressing whether the Constitution "applies in any territory that is not a State." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 756. See De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 1 (1901); Dooley v. United States, 182 U.S. 222 (1901); Armstrong v. United States, 182 U.S. 243 (1901); Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901); Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197 (1903); Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138 (1904). Adopting a pragmatic approach, this Court created "the doctrine of territorial incorporation," under which certain fundamental constitutional rights (but not all constitutional rights) apply to noncitizens in unincorporated territories. Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 757-58. Rather than "enforc[e] all constitutional provisions 'always and everywhere,'" the Court "not[ed] the inherent practical difficulties" of full incorporation and considered each provision individually, sensitive to the specific concerns presented in each case. Id. at 759 (quoting Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 312 (1922)). As this Court put it in Boumediene, "the Court devised in the Insular Cases a doctrine that allowed it to use its power sparingly and where it would be most needed." Id.

Functional considerations also proved "decisive" half a century later in Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), which held that the spouses of American servicemen living on military bases abroad were entitled to trial by jury. Boumediene, 533 U.S. at 760. Although the plurality opinion rested primarily on the petitioners' status as American citizens, two concurring opinions by Justices Frankfurter and Harlan—"whose votes were necessary to the Court's disposition"—instead relied on "practical considerations" unrelated to citizenship. Id. Justice Frankfurter rejected the "broad principle" that the Constitution has no application beyond the "limits of the United States," endorsing a flexible approach that looks at the "specific circumstances of each particular case." Reid, 354 U.S. at 54. And Justice Harlan likewise favored pragmatism—not a "rigid and abstract rule." Id. at 75. To him, the "crucial" considerations are "the particular circumstances, the practical necessities, and the possible alternatives" presented, as well as whether enforcement would be "impractical and anomalous." Id. "The question is one of judgment," he explained, "not compulsion." Id.

"Practical considerations [also] weighed heavily" in Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, which denied access to the writ of habeas corpus to "enemy aliens" imprisoned "in Germany during the Allied Powers' post-war occupation." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 762. The Court's opinion "stressed the difficulties" of granting this right and the "practical barriers" it would pose. Id. at 762-63. Although the opinion includes language suggesting that the Court may have "adopted a formalistic, sovereignty-based test," Boumediene "reject[ed] this reading," finding that "practical considerations" were "integral" to Eisentrager's outcome. Id. at 762-63. Boumediene also expressed doubt that Eisentrager "used the term sovereignty only in the narrow technical sense," without taking into consideration "the degree of control" exerted by the U.S. and whether the U.S. could act "without accountability." Id. at 763. Had Eisentrager adopted a "bright-line test," Boumediene emphasized, its holding would have been "inconsistent with the functional approach to questions of extraterritoriality" in this Court's cases. Id. at 764.

Finally, Boumediene drew on Justice Kennedy's concurrence in Verdugo-Urquidez, which adopted Justice Harlan's "'impracticable and anomalous' extraterritoriality test" and applied it "in the Fourth Amendment context." Id. at 760. Justice Kennedy expressly disagreed with the formalist reasoning of the four other Justices to join the Verdugo-Urquidez opinion, and instead "advocated a functional analysis of extraterritoriality" derived from the Insular Cases and Justice Harlan's concurrence in Reid. App. 38a (Prado, J.). Conducting that analysis, Justice Kennedy listed a number of "conditions and considerations of this case [that] would make adherence to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement impracticable and anomalous," including "[t]he absence of local judges or magistrates available to issue warrants, the differing and perhaps unascertainable conceptions of reasonableness and privacy that prevail abroad, and the need to cooperate with foreign officials." Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 277. These practical considerations, Justice Kennedy concluded, "all indicate that the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement should not apply in Mexico as it does in this country." Id.

After surveying this Court's cases, Boumediene observed that the "common thread uniting" them is their shared recognition that "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." 553 U.S. at 764. Although the Court acknowledged that some cases arguably could be read to support the notion that "de jure sovereignty" is "the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution," the Court refused to read its cases "to conflict in this manner." Id.

Having rejected a "formal sovereignty-based test," Boumediene applied a functional framework and held that detainees in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, are "entitled to the privilege of habeas corpus to challenge the legality of their detention." Id. at 764, 771. The Court based its conclusion on the "objective degree of control" and "practical sovereignty" that the U.S. exerts over the Guantánamo Bay prison, and found that these factors outweighed the "costs to holding the Suspension Clause applicable," which are not "dispositive." Id. at 754, 769.

B. The Fifth Circuit's decision cannot be reconciled with this Court's functional approach, as articulated in Boumediene. The decision holds that the Fourth Amendment does not apply here because Sergio Hernández was a Mexican citizen with no significant voluntary connection to the U.S. who was "standing on Mexican soil at the time he was shot." App. 4a. That is the extent of the Court's analysis. There is no discussion of any of the pragmatic and context-specific considerations Boumediene identified as central to extraterritoriality analysis, including whether the U.S. effectively controls the border area where Sergio was killed. Nor is there any mention of whether applying constitutional protection in these circumstances would be "impracticable and anomalous"—an inquiry Justice Kennedy twice emphasized as critical, first in his concurring opinion in Verdugo-Urquidez, and then again in his opinion for the Court in Boumediene.

Eschewing those opinions, the Fifth Circuit instead relied on the Court's opinion in Verdugo-Urquidez, which held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply "to the search and seizure by United States agents of property that is owned by a nonresident alien and located in a foreign country." 494 U.S. at 261. The Court based this holding primarily on the Fourth Amendment's text (its use of the phrase "the people") and reasoned that Verdugo-Urquidez "had no voluntary connection with this country that might place him among 'the people.'" Id. at 273. The Court also looked to the pre-Boumediene caselaw, and noted that a "global view" of the Fourth Amendment "would have significant and deleterious consequences for the United States in conducting activities beyond its boundaries," including its "foreign policy operations." Id.

Although Justice Kennedy joined the Verdugo-Urquidez opinion (thus supplying the fifth vote), and did not believe that his views "depart[ed] in fundamental respect from the opinion of the Court," he wrote separately to explain why he disagreed with the formalist approach of the other four Justices. 494 U.S. at 275. He could not "place any weight on the reference to 'the people' in the Fourth Amendment," and instead focused on pragmatic considerations: whether "adherence to [the] warrant requirement" abroad would be "impracticable and anomalous." Id. at 276.

By extending Verdugo-Urquidez's "significant voluntary connection" test beyond the warrant requirement—without asking whether extraterritorial application would be "impracticable and anomalous" under the circumstances—the Fifth Circuit disregarded the "common thread uniting" this Court's cases and flouted Boumediene. 553 U.S. at 764. This Court should grant certiorari to reassert its holding in Boumediene and make clear that the Fourth Amendment's applicability to a deadly shooting at the U.S.-Mexico border "turn[s] on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." Id.

C. Certiorari is also warranted because the decision below departs from the Ninth Circuit's extraterritoriality framework, which applies Verdugo-Urquidez's "significant voluntary connection" test in conjunction with—rather than instead of—"the 'functional approach' of Boumediene." Ibrahim, 669 F.3d at 997.

1. Unlike the Fifth Circuit, the Ninth Circuit recognizes that "the border of the United States is not a clear line that separates aliens who may bring constitutional challenges from those who may not." Id. at 995. Quoting Boumediene, the Ninth Circuit in Ibrahim explained that "[i]n determining the constitutional rights of aliens outside the United States, the [Supreme] Court applies a 'functionalist approach' rather than a bright-line rule." Id. The Ninth Circuit held that it was "bound to follow" this Court's functionalist approach in addition to Verdu- go-Urquidez's "significant voluntary connections" test, thereby integrating an otherwise rigid test into a functionalist analysis. Id. at 997. Although the court ultimately determined that Ibrahim had sufficient connections with the U.S. and applied the Constitution on that basis, there is no reason to think that having such connections is a prerequisite to extraterritoriality in the Ninth Circuit, as it is in the Fifth Circuit. That would be a formalist approach—not a functionalist one.

Indeed, the Ninth Circuit's functionalist approach has already been applied to indistinguishable facts and led to an outcome that directly conflicts with the decision below. In Rodriguez v. Swartz, a Border Patrol agent shot and killed an unarmed Mexican teenager on the Mexican side of the border, and his parents asserted a Fourth Amendment claim against the agent. No. 14-cv-02251 (D. Ariz. July 9, 2015) (App. 153a). Because the agent was in Arizona when he fired his weapon, as opposed to Texas, the court applied "Boumediene in conjunction with Verdugo-Urquidez," as the Ninth Circuit requires. Id. at 12 (App. 168a). Under that framework, the court held that Rodriguez had a "fundamental right to be free from the United States government's arbitrary use of deadly force." Id. at 14 (App. 171a). The court did not give dispositive weight to the voluntary-connections factor, but assessed it along with "the many practical considerations and factors the Supreme Court of the United States has ordered the lower courts to consider." Id. at 16 (App. 173a). And it reached the opposite conclusion.

Thus, as Rodriguez illustrates, under the Ninth Circuit's approach, Boumediene applies and the "voluntary connections" factor is not given dispositive weight, but is considered alongside practical factors. Under the Fifth Circuit's approach, by sharp contrast, Boumediene is treated as irrelevant and an alien must have "significant voluntary connections" to the U.S. to receive any Fourth Amendment protection at all beyond our formal borders.

Rodriguez expressly acknowledged the divergence between the two approaches: "Applying [the Ninth] Circuit's case law"—which requires "[w]eighing all of the [relevant] factors"—to indistinguishable facts generates "a different conclusion from that of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Hernandez." Id. at 7, 16 (App. 162a, 172a). Such a dramatic divergence between the two biggest border circuits on such a fundamental constitutional question cannot be tolerated. And because the Ninth Circuit is bound by its panel decision in Ibrahim, there is no need to await its decision in Rodriguez.

2. The disagreement in this area is not limited to just these two circuits or the interplay between Boumediene and Verdugo-Urquidez. For more than two decades, courts and commentators have struggled in interpreting the precise meaning of Verdugo-Urquidez, with some going so far as to call the opinion a "plurality." The Second, Third, and Ninth Circuits, for example, have noted that only "a plurality of the Court" embraced the opinion's formalist reasoning. Lamont v. Woods, 948 F.2d 825, 835 (2d Cir. 1991); see United States v. Boynes, 149 F.3d 208, 211 n.3 (3d Cir. 1998) (explaining that "two of the six justices in the Verdugo-Urquidez majority coalition did not join the other four justices' reasoning completely"); Sissoko v. Rocha, 440 F.3d 1145, 1167 n.33 (9th Cir. 2006) (referring to "the plurality opinion in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez"), superseded by 509 F.3d 947 (9th Cir. 2007). Judge Bates has similarly described the Verdugo-Urquidez "plurality opinion" as "suggesting that certain rights under the First and Fourth Amendments inure to the benefit of only those with sufficient connections to the United States." Kadi v. Geithner, 42 F. Supp. 3d 1, 25 (D.D.C. 2012). And Professor Gerald Neuman has explained that Justice Kennedy's Verdugo-

Urquidez concurrence "diverged so greatly from [the Court's] analysis and conclusions that [Chief Justice] Rehnquist seemed to really be speaking for a plurality of four." Whose Constitution?, 100 Yale L.J. 909, 972 (1991).

This confusion has only grown after Boumediene. Since that decision, "uncertainty has reigned" around how courts should determine when constitutional rights apply abroad. Joshua Geltzer, Of Suspension, Due Process, and Guantanamo, 14 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 719, 720 (2012); see also Christina Duffy Burnett, A Convenient Constitution? Extraterritoriality After Boumediene, 109 Colum. L. Rev. 973 (2009). "Courts and commentators alike have already felled many forests grappling with the hard questions [the case] leaves in its wake." Stephen I. Vladeck, Boumediene's Quiet Theory: Access to Courts and the Separation of Powers, 84 Notre Dame L. Rev. 2107 (2009). This case presents an ideal vehicle for this Court to resolve the confusion.

D. By applying the wrong methodology, the decision below reached the wrong outcome. Had the Fifth Circuit applied a functionalist analysis, the court would have held that the Fourth Amendment protects against the arbitrary use of deadly force under these circumstances.

Sergio Hernández was killed in a culvert that U.S. officials patrol and effectively control. Border Patrol agents exercise their duties "within feet" of where he was shot, and routinely "act on or even across" the border to "ensur[e] that [the] physical border is not the first or last line of defense, but one of many." App. 84a-85a. And when they do so, they "are not 'answerable to' U.S. border partners." App. 86a. Thus, "even though the United States has no formal control or de facto sovereignty over the Mexican side of the border, the heavy presence and regular activity of federal agents across a permanent border without any shared accountability weigh in favor of recognizing" constitutional protection. Id.

Moreover, this case triggers none of the factors that make extending constitutional rights "impracticable and anomalous." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 769. Border Patrol agents are already required to "use the minimum non-deadly force necessary" at all times, 8 C.F.R. § 287.8(a)(1)(iii), and are constitutionally liable for using deadly force without justification against any individual in the U.S., and against American citizens across the border. Recognizing a Fourth Amendment right in this case would have the "unremarkable effect" of applying the same constitutional requirement to foreign citizens who happen to be standing just south of the border. App. 88a. That would not force agents to change their conduct to conform to new standards; it would simply create an enforcement mechanism for rules already in place.

Nor would applying Fourth Amendment protection in this case subject activities like U.S. surveillance in Mexico to constitutional scrutiny, as the panel below incorrectly believed. App. 79a. "This case addresses only the use of deadly force by U.S. Border Patrol agents in seizing individuals at and near the United States-Mexico border." Rodriguez, No. 14-cv-02251, at 15 (App. 172a). It does not involve extraterritoriality of the Fourth Amendment more broadly.

While the costs of recognizing a Fourth Amendment right here are minimal, the costs of denying it are high. If this Court allows the Fifth Circuit's decision to stand, it will hand the Executive unaccountable power of the kind the Court has previously refused to grant. In 2004, this Court rejected the government's argument that U.S. courts lack jurisdiction over Guantánamo Bay, holding that the Executive may not exempt its activities from judicial review. Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 486 (2004). The same separation-of-powers concern animated this Court's decision in Boumediene, which observed that "[w]ithin the Constitution's separation-of-powers structure, few exercises of judicial power are as legitimate or as necessary as the responsibility to hear challenges to the authority of the Executive to imprison a person." 553 U.S. at 797. It seems no stretch to say the same of the Executive's power to kill a person.

The Fifth Circuit's decision also gives Border Patrol agents the ability to "switch the Constitution on or off"—a power the Boumediene Court explicitly denied the Executive. Id. at 727. The en banc opinion tells agents that if they simply ensure that Mexicans are standing on the Mexican side of the border, they can shoot with impunity, free of constitutional constraints. Not only does that resurrect the territorial formalism that Boumediene rejected; it also enables the Executive to play territorial arbitrage with the Constitution—manipulation that Boumediene forbids. Id.

II. The Fifth Circuit's qualified-immunity holding creates a circuit split and is in serious tension with the purposes of qualified immunity as articulated in this Court's cases.

Certiorari is equally warranted on the second question presented: Can qualified immunity be granted or denied based on an officer's after-the-fact discovery of a person's legal status? By answering yes, the decision below creates a circuit split with the Ninth Circuit's decision in Moreno v. Baca, 431 F.3d 633, as well as decisions from other circuits, and undermines the purposes of qualified immunity as described by this Court.

A. The Ninth Circuit's decision in Moreno involved the search and seizure of a parolee without reasonable suspicion. Id. at 636. Although Moreno's status as a parolee arguably made the search and seizure constitutional because parolees have diminished Fourth Amendment rights, the officers did not learn that he was on parole until "after searching and detaining him." Id. at 637 (emphasis added). Nonetheless, the officers argued that they were entitled to qualified immunity even if their search violated the Fourth Amendment because "it was not clearly established that Moreno had any right to be free from suspicionless searches because of his parole status." Id. at 642 (emphasis added).

The Ninth Circuit rejected that argument and denied qualified immunity. Id. Had the officers "known of the parole condition at the time of the search and seizure," the court explained, they might have been entitled to qualified immunity. Id. But "[b]ecause the Deputies did not know of Moreno's parole status" when "they searched and seized him," the Ninth Circuit held that this later-discovered fact "cannot justify their conduct." Id. "At the time of the incident," the court elaborated, "it was clearly established that the facts upon which the reasonableness of a search or seizure depends, whether it be an outstanding arrest warrant, a parole condition, or any other fact, must be known to the officer at the time the search or seizure is conducted." Id.

Three weeks later, the en banc Ninth Circuit expressly "agree[d]" with Moreno's rule that qualified immunity is unavailable to officers who "justify their actions retroactively" based on facts unknown to them at the time of the alleged misconduct. Motley v. Parks, 432 F.3d 1072, 1088 (9th Cir. 2005), overruled in part on other grounds by United States v. King, 687 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc). To receive qualified immunity, the court emphasized, an officer "must be aware" of the key facts "before" committing the disputed act. Id.

The decision below cannot be reconciled with Moreno. Without deciding whether Agent Mesa violated Sergio Hernández's Fifth Amendment rights—and thus assuming a violation for qualified-immunity purposes—the Fifth Circuit granted Mesa immunity based on the fact that Sergio was later determined to be a Mexican citizen "who had no significant voluntary connection to, and was not in, the United States" when he was killed. App. 5a. The court found that Mesa was not "reasonably warned" that killing someone under these circumstances "violated the Fifth Amendment." Id. The court reached that conclusion even though "[a]t the time of the incident" Mesa "did not know of [Sergio's] status" as a Mexican citizen with no significant U.S. connections, thus allowing Mesa to rely on that fact to "justify [his] conduct." Moreno, 431 F.3d at 642. That holding—that a later-discovered fact justified immunity even where it was not known to the officer when he acted—is exactly the opposite of what the Ninth Circuit held in Moreno.

As a result of these contradictory conclusions, there is now a "circuit split between, among other rulings, the en banc Fifth Circuit's analysis in Hernandez and the Ninth Circuit's 2005 decision in Moreno." Steve Vladeck, Cross-Border Shootings as a Test Case for the Extraterritorial Fourth Amendment, Just Security, July 10, 2015, http://bit.ly/1KeG31y. Consequently, if this shooting had occurred at the Mexican border in Arizona rather than Texas, the agent would not be entitled to qualified immunity and the court could not have avoided the constitutional question on the merits, as the Fifth Circuit did here.

And the risk of inconsistent outcomes is no mere hypothetical. Just this month, the U.S. District Court of Arizona held—on facts nearly identical to those here—that qualified immunity was unavailable to a border agent who shot and killed an unarmed teenager on the Mexican side of the border. Rodriguez, No. 14-cv-02251, at 20 (App. 178a). As in this case, the agent "was an American law enforcement officer standing on American soil" who was "well-aware of the limits on the use of deadly force against U.S. citizens and non-citizens alike within the United States." Id. at 19-20 (App. 177a). And, as in this case, the agent could not have known "whether [the boy] was a United States citizen or the citizen of a foreign country, and if [he] had significant voluntary connections to the United States." Id. at 20 (App. 177a). Instead, as here, "[i]t was only after [the agent] shot [the boy] and learned of [his] identity as a Mexican national that he had any reason to think he might be entitled to qualified immunity." Id. (App. 177-78a). But because that case arose from a shooting at the Arizona border—not the Texas border—the district court, following Moreno, denied the border agent qualified immunity because the agent only "learned of [the boy's] status as a non-citizen after the violation." Id. (App. 178a) (citing Moreno, 431 F.3d at 641).

Because Rodriguez simply "highlights an already existing circuit split," it cannot be resolved by the Ninth Circuit on appeal. Vladeck, Cross-Border Shootings. "So long as Moreno is on the books, the Ninth Circuit can't avoid the merits question merely by holding that [the agent] is entitled to qualified immunity," as the Fifth Circuit did. Id. Instead, it will have no choice but to deny the agent immunity if he violated the Constitution—in square conflict with the Fifth Circuit's holding below. This court should resolve that conflict now and bring the Fifth Circuit into harmony with the Ninth Circuit.

Nor does the Fifth Circuit's holding comport with the approach of other circuits. Like the Ninth Circuit, the Seventh and Eleventh Circuits reject the use of "hindsight to judge the acts of police officers" and instead "look at what they knew (or reasonably should have known) at the time of the act"; information "unknown to the officer at the time" does not factor into the analysis. Rodriguez v. Farrell, 280 F.3d 1341, 1353 (11th Cir. 2002). That rule has been applied to ensure that officers deserving immunity are not subjected to trial based on facts beyond their ken. Reasonable force, for example, "does not become excessive force when the force aggravates (however severely) a pre-existing condition the extent of which was unknown to the officer at the time." Id. This rule, the Eleventh Circuit has explained, ensures that qualified immunity does not turn entirely on "the fortuity of the circumstances." Lee, 284 F.3d at 1200. The Seventh Circuit follows the same rule, emphasizing that the only relevant "information" is that which the officer "possessed at the time the incident occurred." McDonald by McDonald v. Haskins, 966 F.2d 292, 293 (7th Cir. 1992).

B. The Fifth Circuit's decision does more than create conflict among the circuits; it also misconstrues this Court's qualified-immunity cases.

This Court has long emphasized that qualified immunity "provide[s] no license to lawless conduct." Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 819 (1982). To the contrary, the doctrine "balances two important interests—the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably." Pearson, 555 U.S. at 231. To carry out these dual aims, this Court has devised a two-part test, which lower courts may answer in either order: Do the facts "make out a violation of a constitutional right"? Id. at 232. If so, is the officer nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because he was not "on notice," at the time of the incident, that his conduct was unlawful? Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002).

The Fifth Circuit's decision misapprehends this test and in doing so severely undermines its purpose. As this Court has explained, the "relevant question" for qualified immunity is "whether a reasonable officer could have believed [the conduct] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information the . . . officers possessed" at the time. Creighton, 483 U.S. at 641. Under that approach, "an officer enjoys qualified immunity and is not liable for excessive force unless he has violated a 'clearly established' right, such that 'it would [have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'" Kinglsey v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2474 (2015) (emphasis added)). By focusing on the information the officer possessed at the time, this inquiry mirrors the Court's approach to the excessive-force question on the merits, which looks at "the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight," Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, and considers only "the facts available to the officer at the moment" of the alleged violation, Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 188 (1990). Yet the Fifth Circuit did not follow this approach. It did not ask whether Mesa violated clearly established law based on what he knew (or reasonably should have known) in the situation he confronted, but instead used hindsight and asked whether he violated clearly established law based on what the facts later turned out to be.

The consequences of that novel approach are intolerable. Under the Fifth Circuit's new "hindsight" rule, which now operates in Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi, competent officers will be subjected to suit based on after-the-fact discoveries about which they could not have known at the time, even if the officers otherwise acted reasonably. Just as unpalatable, officers like Mesa will be allowed to escape liability even if they are "plainly incompetent," Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341 (1986), or exhibit "obvious cruelty," Pelzer, 536 U.S. at 745—"simply because the fortuity of the circumstances" end up creating some uncertainty about which the officer could not have known at the time, Lee, 284 F.3d at 1200. That makes no sense. The correct rule—the one adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Moreno, and the one that is faithful to this Court's qualified-immunity jurisprudence—avoids these outcomes. By doing so, it advances (rather than undermines) the two competing interests at the heart of the doctrine.

Had the Fifth Circuit applied the correct rule here, it would not have granted Mesa qualified immunity. Mesa does not argue that a reasonable officer in his shoes would have believed that deadly force was necessary in the situation that he faced. See Graham, 490 U.S. at 397. Rather, he argues that his conduct, even if "far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force," should be immunized because, as fortune would have it, Sergio happened to be a Mexican citizen with no voluntary connections to the U.S., who was standing just across the border when he was killed. Smith v. Mattox, 127 F.3d 1416, 1419 (11th Cir. 1997).

But no reasonable officer would have known those facts at the time. Roughly one million U.S. citizens live in Mexico, including more than 500,000 children, many of whom were born in American border cities like El Paso, but whose families are Mexican and reside across the border in Mexico. See U.S. State Department, U.S. Relations With Mexico: Fact Sheet (Sept. 2014), http://1.usa.gov/1cogco2; Adriana Gomez, U.S.-born kids lose basic rights in Mexico, Associated Press, July 18, 2012, http://bit.ly/1JhJNzq. Sergio could have been one of those children, playing with his friends on a summer day, and Mesa would not have known. Nor is it clear that Mesa knew that Sergio happened to be just across the borderline running through the culvert at that particular location, rather than just inside it. And if either fact had turned out to be different, Mesa would not be entitled to qualified immunity.

But even if a reasonable officer would have known these facts, or could have made a reasonable guess that Sergio was a Mexican citizen standing on Mexican soil at the time, there is no way the officer could have known, ex ante, the extent of Sergio's voluntary connections with the U.S., and whether they were significant. So why should Mesa be permitted to rely on that later-discovered fact for qualified-immunity purposes—particularly when he was not trained to take these facts into account when deciding whether to use lethal force?

Indeed, Border Patrol agents are required by law to focus on objective risk factors in determining whether to use lethal force—not the citizenship of the subject, whether they have significant connections to the U.S., or whether they happen to be on one side of the border as opposed to the other. See 8 C.F.R. §§ 287.8(a)(1)(iii) & (2). These regulations are "[r]elevant to the question" whether Mesa had "fair warning" of the "wrongful character of [his] conduct," regardless of whether they were treated by Border Patrol agents as "merely a sham" they "could ignore . . . with impunity." Pelzer, 536 U.S. at 743-44.

Finally, granting qualified immunity is especially inappropriate here, in a case involving an unjustified extrajudicial killing. "One of the less controversial aspects of the due process clause is its implicit prohibition against a public officer's intentionally killing a person, or seriously impairing the person's health, without any justification." K.H. Through Murphy v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846, 848 (7th Cir. 1990) (Posner, J.). In such cases, where the wrongfulness of the conduct is "obvious," Pelzer, 536 U.S. at 745, it would turn the doctrine on its head to grant the officer qualified immunity based on later discoveries about citizenship, voluntary connections, and precise physical location. See Lee, 284 F.3d at 1199-1200 (declining to grant immunity based on later developments where "the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits"). And if Agent Mesa thinks otherwise—if his defense is that it wasn't clear that any law prevented an unjustified, extrajudicial killing at the border—then that is all the more reason for this Court to grant certiorari on the first question presented as well as the second.

CONCLUSION

The petition for certiorari should be granted.

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas

Before STEWART, Chief Judge, and JOLLY, DAVIS, JONES, SMITH, DENNIS, CLEMENT, PRADO, OWEN, ELROD, SOUTHWICK, HAYNES, GRAVES, HIGGINSON, and COSTA, Circuit Judges.*

PER CURIAM:

We rehear this matter en banc, see Hernandez v. United States, 771 F.3d 818 (5th Cir. 2014) (per curiam) (on petitions for rehearing en banc), to resolve whether, under facts unique to this or any other circuit, the individual defendants in these consolidated appeals are entitled to qualified immunity. Unanimously concluding that the plaintiffs fail to allege a violation of the Fourth Amendment, and that the Fifth Amendment right asserted by the plaintiffs was not clearly established at the time of the complained-of incident, we affirm the judgment of dismissal.

The facts and course of proceedings are accurately set forth in the panel majority opinion of Judge Prado, Hernandez v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 255–57 (5th Cir. 2014). We conclude that the panel opinion rightly

---

* Judge DeMoss was a member of the panel and, as a senior judge, elected to participate in the en banc proceedings pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 46(c) and 5th Circuit Rule 35.6. Although Judge DeMoss participated in the oral argument and the court's deliberations, he subsequently retired from the court, effective April 16, 2015. Before retiring, Judge DeMoss authored the following special concurrence, which would have been issued if he were still a member of the court:

HAROLD R. DeMOSS, JR., Circuit Judge, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment:

I concur in the en banc court's reinstatement of Parts I, II, and VI of the panel's opinion. Furthermore, I concur in the en banc court's assessment that United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), precludes a Fourth Amendment claim on the facts of this case. As to the Fifth Amendment claim, I concur in the judgment of the en banc court for the reasons stated in my dissent from the panel opinion. See Hernandez v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 281–82 (5th Cir. 2014) (DeMoss, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

affirms the dismissal of Hernandez's claims against the United States, id. at 257–59, and against Agent Mesa's supervisors, id. at 280, and we therefore REINSTATE Parts I, II, and VI of that opinion. We additionally hold that pursuant to United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), Hernandez, a Mexican citizen who had no "significant voluntary connection" to the United States, id. at 271, and who was on Mexican soil at the time he was shot, cannot assert a claim under the Fourth Amendment.

The remaining issue for the en banc court is properly described as whether "the Fifth Amendment ... protect[s] a non-citizen with no connections to the United States who suffered an injury in Mexico where the United States has no formal control or de facto sovereignty." Id. at 281–82 (DeMoss, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). To underscore the seriousness of the tragic incident under review, we elaborate on that description only to note that the injury was the death of a teenaged Mexican national from a gunshot fired by a Border Patrol agent standing on U.S. soil.

To decide the assertion of qualified immunity made by defendant Agent Mesa, regarding the plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment claim, the court avails itself of the latitude afforded by Pearson v. Callahan: "The judges of the ... courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand." 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009) (overruling Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001)).

The prongs referred to are familiar: "First, a court must decide whether the facts ... alleged ... make out a violation of a constitutional right.... Second, if [so], the court must decide whether the right at issue was 'clearly established' at the time of [the] alleged misconduct." Id. at 232. "Qualified immunity is applicable unless [both prongs are satisfied]." Id.

The panel opinion correctly describes the substantive-due-process claim as "that Agent Mesa showed callous disregard for Hernandez's Fifth Amendment rights by using excessive, deadly force when Hernandez was unarmed and presented no threat." Hernandez, 757 F.3d at 267. The question is whether, under the unique facts and circumstances presented here, that right was "clearly established."

The Supreme Court has carefully admonished that we are "not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality." Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011). To the contrary, a right is clearly established only where "it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted." Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004) (per curiam) (quoting Saucier, 533 U.S. at 202) (internal quotation marks omitted). The question here is whether the general prohibition of excessive force applies where the person injured by a U.S. official standing on U.S. soil is an alien who had no significant voluntary connection to, and was not in, the United States when the incident occurred. No case law in 2010, when this episode occurred, reasonably warned Agent Mesa that his conduct violated the Fifth Amendment.

Although the en banc court is somewhat divided on the question of whether Agent Mesa's conduct violated the Fifth Amendment, the court, with the benefit of further consideration and en banc supplemental briefing and oral argument, is unanimous in concluding that any properly asserted right was not clearly established to the extent the law requires. The strongest authority for the plaintiffs may be Boumediene v. Bush, which addressed whether the Suspension Clause of the U.S. Constitution applied to aliens detained outside the United States at the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. 553 U.S. 723, 732–33 (2008). Although the Court drew on cases from contexts other than habeas corpus, see id. at 755–64 (discussing the Court's precedents on "the Constitution's extraterritorial application," including, inter alia, the Insular Cases, In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891), Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), and Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259), it expressly limited its holding to the facts before it, see id. at 795 ("Our decision today holds only that petitioners before us are entitled to seek the writ; that the [Detainee Treatment Act] review procedures are an inadequate substitute for habeas corpus; and that petitioners in these cases need not exhaust the review procedures in the Court of Appeals before proceeding with their habeas actions in the District Court."). Accordingly, nothing in that opinion presages, with the directness that the "clearly established" standard requires, whether the Court would extend the territorial reach of a different constitutional provision—the Fifth Amendment—and would do so where the injury occurs not on land long controlled by the United States, but on soil that is indisputably foreign and beyond the United States' territorial sovereignty. By deciding this case on a ground on which the court is in consensus, we bypass that issue by giving allegiance to "the general rule of constitutional avoidance." Callahan, 555 U.S. at 241.

"There are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right." Id. at 237. Reasonable minds can differ on whether Boumediene may someday be explicitly extended as the plaintiffs urge. That is the chore of the first prong of the qualified-immunity test, which we do not address.

The alleged right at issue was not clearly established, under these facts, in 2010.

The judgment of dismissal is AFFIRMED.

EDITH H. JONES, Circuit Judge, joined by SMITH, CLEMENT, and OWEN, Circuit Judges, concurring:

The court has unfortunately taken the path of least resistance. We hold unanimously that Agent Mesa has qualified immunity from this suit for a Fifth Amendment substantive due process violation because he did not violate any clearly established rights flowing from that Amendment. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236, 129 S. Ct. 808, 818 (2009). This compromise simply delays the day of reckoning until another appellate panel revisits non-citizen tort claims for excessive force resting on extraterritorial application of the United States Constitution. Ongoing incursions across our national borders and our nation's applications of force abroad ensure that other lawsuits will be pursued. We should discourage this litigation before it takes root.

Because it is clear that United States constitutional rights do not extend to aliens who (a) lack any connection to the United States and (b) are injured on foreign soil, I would also resolve this appeal on the first prong of qualified immunity analysis. See id. at 236, 129 S. Ct. at 818 ("In some cases, a discussion of why the relevant facts do not violate clearly established law may make it apparent that in fact the relevant facts do not make out a constitutional violation at all.").[1]

[1] The en banc court did not consider whether, even if a constitutional claim had been stated, a tort remedy should be

Whether a constitutional violation occurred here is a straightforward inquiry with a definite answer. First, if the plaintiffs have a constitutional claim at all, it arises under the Fourth Amendment, not the Fifth. See Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 394, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 1870–71 (1989). This en banc court re-confirms, however, that the Fourth Amendment protects only aliens with "significant voluntary connection[s]" to this country. United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 271, 110 S. Ct. 1056, 1064 (1990). Because Hernandez had no such prior connections, the Fourth Amendment claim fails.

Additionally, substantive due process under the Fifth Amendment does not offer a fallback claim here, not least because of the expressly limited reach of the Supreme Court's decision in Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008). Judge DeMoss's dissent from the panel opinion aptly expressed incredulity about extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment:

> If the fact that the United States exerts and has exerted powerful influence over northern Mexico, justifies application of the Fifth Amendment in a strip along the border, how wide is that strip? Is the Fifth Amendment applicable in all of Ciudad Juarez or even the entire state of Chihuahua? Ultimately, the majority's approach devolves into a line drawing game which is entirely unnecessary because there is a border between the United States and Mexico.

crafted under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). Our en banc opinion neither assumes nor decides that question.

Hernandez v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 281 (5th Cir. 2014) (DeMoss, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

I also feel obliged to comment on the plaintiffs' Alien Tort Statute ("ATS") claim against the United States, which has been rejected by the panel, by the unanimous compromise en banc opinion, and indeed by every other circuit court of appeals.[2] A concurring opinion here arguably supports the assertion of nebulous claims for violations of "jus cogens " and blithely suggests that the United States' sovereign immunity may be ineffective in American courts against such claims. Among the many troubling implications of the separate opinion, it turns on its head the Supreme Court's obvious reluctance to expand federal judges' authority to import customary international law theories into domestic tort law without careful articulation and severe limitations or Congressional action. See Sosa v. Alvarez–Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 732, 124 S. Ct. 2739, 2765–66 (2004) (plaintiff's claim for "arbitrary arrest and detention" failed to state a violation of the law of nations with requisite "definite content and acceptance among civilized nations"); Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., ___ U.S. ___, 133 S. Ct. 1659, 1669 (2013) (presumption against extraterritoriality applies to Alien Tort Statute).

[2] See Princz v. Fed. Republic of Germany, 26 F.3d 1166, 1174 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (rejecting the argument that jus cogens violations implicitly waive sovereign immunity under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act); Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina, 965 F.2d 699, 718–19 (9th Cir. 1992) (same); Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. United States, 967 F.2d 965, 968–69 (4th Cir. 1992) (rejecting plaintiffs' argument that the ATS waived the United States' sovereign immunity); Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 207 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (holding that "[t]he Alien Tort Statute itself is not a waiver of sovereign immunity").

I. The Fourth Amendment, not the Fifth, Controls

The plaintiffs characterized their claims as arising under either the Fifth or the Fourth Amendment. But on these facts, they can only have a Fourth Amendment claim. Constitutional rights are not interchangeable. When a litigant asserts multiple constitutional claims arising from the same conduct, we must "identify[ ] the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed...." Graham, 490 U.S. at 394, 109 S. Ct. at 1870. If it becomes apparent that "a particular Amendment 'provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection' against a particular sort of government behavior, 'that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of substantive due process, must be the guide for analyzing these claims.' " Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 273, 114 S. Ct. 807, 813 (1994) (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 395, 109 S. Ct. at 1871) (internal quotation marks and footnote omitted). In essence, the specific trumps the general. This is especially true when a plaintiff brings both Fourth and Fifth Amendment claims asserting law enforcement misconduct. The Court has emphatically stated that "all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure' of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its 'reasonableness' standard, rather than under a 'substantive due process' approach." Graham, 490 U.S. at 395, 109 S. Ct. at 1871 (emphasis in original). Accordingly, substantive due process analysis is appropriate only if the plaintiffs' claim is not "covered by" the Fourth Amendment. Cnty. of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 843, 118 S. Ct. 1708, 1715 (1998)

(applying substantive due process where the passenger of a motorcyclist being pursued by police was killed).[3]

Agent Mesa undoubtedly seized Hernandez. A seizure occurs "when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied." Brower v. Cnty. of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596–97, 109 S. Ct. 1378, 1381 (1989) (emphasis omitted). Law enforcement shootings are also covered by the Fourth Amendment because "there can be no question that apprehension by the use of deadly force is a seizure [.]" Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 7, 105 S. Ct. 1694, 1699 (1985). The plaintiffs' complaint alleges that Agent Mesa intentionally shot and killed Hernandez, thus terminating his "freedom of movement through means intentionally applied." Brower, 489 U.S. at 596–97, 109 S. Ct. at 1381. Under governing law, if the plaintiffs have any claim at all, it arises from the Fourth, not the Fifth Amendment.

[3] The plaintiffs argue that Graham is inapplicable here because its rule only applies to "free citizens." Graham does say all "seizure [s] of [ ] free citizen[s] should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment...." 490 U.S. at 395, 109 S. Ct. at 1871. But the Court could not have intended to give non-citizens the ability to pursue claims under the more nebulous "substantive due process" standard, while limiting American citizens to the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test. Nothing in Graham (other than the above quoted language) supports such an inference. Taken in context, Graham 's reference to "free citizens" was intended to distinguish the scope of protection for "free citizens" from the rights accorded pretrial detainees (under the Fourteenth Amendment) and criminal convicts (under the Eighth Amendment). See Lewis, 523 U.S. at 843, 118 S. Ct. at 1715.

II. The Non–Extraterritoriality of the Fourth Amendment

Although the Fourth Amendment "covers" the plaintiffs' claim, Hernandez did not automatically enjoy its protection. The Constitution does not protect all people in all places. Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 74, 77 S. Ct. 1222, 1260 (1957) (Harlan, J., concurring) ("[T]here are provisions in the Constitution which do not necessarily apply in all circumstances in every foreign place."). This en banc court recognizes that the Supreme Court has foreclosed extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment to aliens where the violation occurs on foreign soil and the alien plaintiff lacks any prior substantial connection to the United States. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 261, 110 S. Ct. at 1059.

Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote in Verdugo–Urquidez that the Fourth Amendment's text refers to the right of "the people" to be free from unreasonable searches. "The people," in turn, "refers to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this country to be considered part of that community." Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 265, 110 S. Ct. at 1061. Turning to the Amendment's history, the Court explained that "[t]he driving force behind the adoption of the Amendment ... was widespread hostility among the former colonists to the issuance of writs of assistance[.]" Id. at 266, 110 S. Ct. at 1061. The Amendment's purpose, "was to protect the people of the United States against arbitrary action by their own Government[.]" Id. In other words, the Fourth Amendment "restrict[s] searches and seizures which might be conducted by the United States in domestic matters." Id. Contemporary historical understanding, the Court continued, confirmed this reading. Id. at 267, 110 S. Ct. at 1061–62. As a result, the Court held, "aliens receive constitutional protections when they have come within the territory of the United States and developed substantial connections with this country." Id. at 271, 110 S. Ct. at 1064.

Despite this seemingly clear pronouncement, critics, including the plaintiffs, claim that the substantial connections test is not—and never was—the law. Because Justice Kennedy concurred and his opinion allegedly differs from the purported majority, the skeptics argue, only four justices concurred in Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion and it is nonbinding. Even if that were not the case, the skeptics continue, Verdugo-Urquidez 's substantial connections test was replaced by the majority opinion in Boumediene. This court disagrees.

Foremost, Justice Kennedy joined the majority in full, not just in judgment. Supreme Court justices know the difference between the types of joinder. Justice Kennedy began his concurrence by stating: "Although some explanation of my views is appropriate given the difficulties of this case, I do not believe they depart in fundamental respects from the opinion of the Court, which I join." Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 275, 110 S. Ct. at 1066 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (emphasis added). If we take Justice Kennedy at his word—as we must—he undoubtedly joined the majority opinion, and the substantial connections test controls.

In any event, the substance of his concurrence does not undermine the substantial connections test—his opinion reinforces it. Concededly, Justice Kennedy did not rely on the Fourth Amendment's reference to "the people"; in his view, "[t]he force of the Constitution is not confined because it was brought into being by certain persons who gave their immediate assent to its terms."[4] Id. at 276, 110 S. Ct. at 1067. Instead, the Constitution's application abroad "depend[s] ... on general principles of interpretation, not on an inquiry as to who formed the Constitution or a construction that some rights are mentioned as being those of 'the people.' " Id., 110 S. Ct. at 1067. Applying such general interpretive principles, Justice Kennedy noted the Court's historic reliance on the distinction between citizens and aliens in determining the Constitution's reach. Id. at 275, 110 S. Ct. at 1066. "The distinction between citizens and aliens," he explained, "follows from the undoubted proposition that the Constitution does not create, nor do general principles of law create, any juridical relation between our country and some undefined, limitless class of noncitizens who are beyond our territory." Id., 110 S. Ct. at 1066. This traditional distinction, Justice Kennedy noted, runs through the Court's cases. Id., 110 S. Ct. at 1066.

For Justice Kennedy, the practical consequences of applying the Fourth Amendment extraterritorially also supports the Court's test. "The absence of local judges or magistrates available to issue warrants, the differing and perhaps unascertainable conceptions of reasonableness

[4] This statement has led at least one court to refer to Justice Rehnquist's reasoning, specifically his reliance on the Fourth Amendment's text, as only adopted by a plurality. See Lamont v. Woods, 948 F.2d 825, 835 (2d Cir.1991) (explaining that "[t]o a plurality of the Court, the use of the phrase 'the people' suggested that the Framers of the Constitution intended the amendment to apply only to those persons who were part of or substantially connected to the national community"). But it does not throw Chief Justice Rehnquist's holding, that only aliens with a substantial connection to the United States have constitutional rights, into doubt. See Ibrahim v. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 669 F.3d 983, 996 (9th Cir. 2012).

and privacy that prevail abroad, and the need to cooperate with foreign officials all indicate that the Fourth Amendment ... should not apply [abroad]." Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 278, 110 S. Ct. at 1068 (Kennedy, J., concurring). "For this reason, in addition to the other persuasive justifications stated by the Court," Justice Kennedy "agree[d] that no violation of the Fourth Amendment [ ] occurred [.]" Id., 110 S. Ct. at 1068. Justice Kennedy's concurrence reinforces rather than undermines Chief Justice Rehnquist's majority opinion.[5] [5] Since the Court decided Verdugo–Urquidez, courts have applied the substantial connections test. See Ibrahim, 669 F.3d at 997 (applying the significant voluntary connection test to an alien's First and Fifth Amendment claims); Kiyemba v. Obama, 555 F.3d 1022, 1026 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (explaining that the "[D]ue [P]rocess [C]lause does not apply to aliens without property or presence in the sovereign territory of the United States"), vacated and remanded, 559 U.S. 131 (2010), reinstated in relevant part, 605 F.3d 1046 (D.C. Cir. 2010); United States v. Emmanuel, 565 F.3d 1324, 1331 (11th Cir. 2009) (holding that the Fourth Amendment does not protect a Bahamian citizen with no substantial connections to the U.S.); Atamirzayeva v. United States, 524 F.3d 1320, 1329 (Fed. Cir. 2008) (holding that a foreign citizen with no substantial connections to the U.S. has no claim under the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause); United States v. Barona, 56 F.3d 1087, 1093–94 (9th Cir. 1995) (explaining that "with regard to foreign searches involving aliens with 'no voluntary connection' to the United States, [ ] the Fourth Amendment is simply inapplicable").

---

III. The Non–Extraterritoriality of the Fifth Amendment[6]

After agreeing that Verdugo–Urquidez forecloses the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim, this court should have been quick to conclude that their alternate Fifth Amendment claim is equally thwarted by Johnson v. Eisentrager. 339 U.S. 763, 70 S. Ct. 936 (1950). The Supreme Court held in Johnson, and has reiterated since then, that as a general matter aliens outside the sovereign territory of the United States are not entitled to Fifth Amendment rights. Id. at 782–85, 70 S. Ct. at 945–47. Verdugo–Urquidez described Johnson as unambiguously "reject[ing] the claim that aliens are entitled to Fifth Amendment rights outside the sovereign territory of the United States." Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 269, 110 S. Ct. at 1063. Johnson was similarly described by the Court in Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693, 121 S. Ct. 2491, 2500 (2001); see also Castro v. Cabrera, 742 F.3d 595, 599 n. 5 (5th Cir. 2014) (noting that Johnson "reject[ed] extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment"). This court is not at liberty to "underrule" Supreme Court decisions when [6] The plaintiffs argue without conviction that because Agent Mesa's conduct occurred solely on U.S. soil, this case does not require extraterritorial application of the Constitution. In both Verdugo–Urquidez and Sosa, however, the Supreme Court treated the cases as involving extraterritorial violations despite the presence of actions on American soil that preceded the foreign incidents. This case is no different. Indeed, the hoary principle of lex loci delicti ("law of the place of injury") historically required the application of the law at the place where the last act causing injury (here, the bullet hitting Hernandez) occurred. Cf. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 708–711, 124 S. Ct. at 2752–2754 (interpreting the Federal Tort Claims Act foreign country exception, 28 U.S.C. § 2680(k), to apply where the injury occurred, not where the last act or omission causing injury occurred).

the Court has explicitly failed to overrule its own precedents. Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/Am. Exp., Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484, 109 S. Ct. 1917, 1921–22 (1989). Consequently, the plaintiffs' substantive due process claim is barred by these precedents.

The plaintiffs' implicit position is that Johnson was de facto overruled by Boumediene, 553 U.S. 723, 128 S. Ct. 2229, and Johnson 's refusal to apply the Fifth Amendment extraterritorially was replaced by the three-part test inaugurated in Boumediene.[7] As I have noted, this court squarely rejects the plaintiffs' argument in regard to the Fourth Amendment. The diffidence with regard to the Fifth Amendment must stem from Boumediene's discussion and theoretical reframing of Johnson. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766, 128 S. Ct. at 2259. Boumediene and Johnson admittedly share the factual similarity that enemy aliens incarcerated outside the continental United States were petitioning for habeas corpus review of their incarceration by the United States military. From the standpoint of this inferior court, however, reading tea leaves as to how far the Supreme Court plans ultimately to press extraterritorial application of constitutional provisions is a useless exercise. Until the Court overrules Johnson, we remain bound by its holding.

To be more precise, Boumediene was expressly limited to holding that the Suspension Clause, art. I, § 9, cl. 2 of the Constitution, applies to enemy combatants detained in the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, military facility.

[7] That test requires courts to examine "(1) the citizenship and status of the detainee and the adequacy of the process through which that status determination was made; (2) the nature of the sites where apprehension and then detention took place; and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner's entitlement to the writ." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766, 128 S. Ct. at 2259.

Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 771, 128 S. Ct. at 2262. The significance of both the "Great Writ" and the United States' plenary control at Guantanamo was equally critical to the Court's holding. The Court stated: "In the system conceived by the Framers the writ had a centrality that must inform proper interpretation of the Suspension Clause," and cited Blackstone, who called it the "bulwark of our liberties." Id. at 739, 742, 128 S. Ct. at 2244, 2246 (citing 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *137). The Court also held that the concerns regarding separation of powers "have particular bearing upon the Suspension Clause question in the cases now before us, for the writ of habeas corpus is itself an indispensable mechanism for monitoring the separation of powers." Id. at 765, 128 S. Ct. at 2259. With respect to the unique circumstances at Guantanamo, the Court variously stated that the Government has "total military and civil control"; "complete jurisdiction and control"; "de facto sovereignty"; and had "complete and uninterrupted control of the bay for over 100 years." Id. at 747, 755, & 764, 128 S. Ct. at 2248, 2253, & 2258.

Boumediene fashioned a test that it claimed to derive from past decisions that considered the extraterritorial reach of other constitutional provisions. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 760, 128 S. Ct. at 2256 (citing In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453, 11 S. Ct. 897 (1891) (Fifth and Sixth Amendments)); id. at 762, 128 S. Ct. at 2257 (citing Johnson, 339 U.S. 763, 70 S. Ct. 936 (Fifth Amendment)); id., 128 S. Ct. at 2257 (citing Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 277, 110 S. Ct. at 1067 (Fourth Amendment)). The Court concluded that de jure sovereignty does not alone determine the extraterritorial reach of the Constitution; instead, "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." Id. at 764, 128 S. Ct. at 2258. But the Court ultimately held its three-factor test relevant "in determining the reach of the Suspension Clause...." Id. at 766, 128 S. Ct. at 2259 (emphasis added). Moreover, the Court disclaimed any intention to overrule the holdings of Johnson or Verdugo–Urquidez. Id. at 795, 128 S. Ct. at 2275.

Given that Boumediene applied its three-factor test to a different constitutional provision than those with which we are confronted, and that it did not overrule the controlling precedents, it bears repeating: this court may not step ahead of the Supreme Court to hold Johnson (or Verdugo–Urquidez) no longer binding. Thus, this is not a case where no "clearly established law" articulates the plaintiffs' rights to extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment. Following Boumediene, there is no law at all supporting their position, and thus no Fifth Amendment claim exists.[8]

Significantly, the plaintiffs cited no case holding that their Fifth Amendment extraterritoriality claim has any viability. To the contrary, in light of the Court's repeated references to the Suspension Clause, we must assume that the Court "explicitly confined its holding 'only' to the extraterritorial reach of the Suspension Clause and disclaimed any intention to disturb existing law governing the extraterritorial reach of any constitutional provisions, other than the Suspension Clause." Ali v.

[8] I need not speculate on whether Boumediene 's rationale will ultimately be extended to determine the extraterritorial reach of other constitutional provisions. It is important to note, however, that even a defender of this prediction acknowledges the need for refinements of the three-factor functional test if Boumediene is brought to bear on other constitutional provisions. See Gerald L. Neuman, The Extraterritorial Constitution After Boumediene v. Bush, 82 S. CAL. L.REV. 259, 287 (2009) ("This nonexclusive [three-factor test] was tailored to the Suspension Clause and its case law, and would presumably need modification to address other rights.").

Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 771 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted); see also Al Bahlul v. United States, 767 F.3d 1, 33 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Henderson, J., concurring) ("Whether Boumediene in fact portends a sea change in the extraterritorial application of the Constitution writ large, we are bound to take the Supreme Court at its word when it limits its holding to the Suspension Clause." (internal citation omitted))[9]; Igartúa v. United States, 626 F.3d 592, 600 (1st Cir. 2010) ("[T]he Boumediene court was concerned only with the Suspension Clause ... not with ... any other constitutional text.").

For all these reasons, the plaintiffs plainly have no cognizable constitutional claim against Agent Mesa.

IV. The Alien Tort Statute Does not Waive U.S. Sovereign Immunity

The plaintiffs seek damages from the United States under the ATS, urging as follows: Congress enacted the ATS to allow aliens to sue for violating "the law of nations." 28 U.S.C. § 1350. The tort alleged in this case is "extrajudicial killing," an alleged violation of jus cogens norms of customary international law.[10] Customary

---

[9] Al Bahlul's holding is not to the contrary. In Al Bahlul, the Government conceded that the Ex Post Facto Clause applies to aliens detained at Guantanamo Bay. 767 F.3d at 18. And the en banc court "assume [d] without deciding that the Ex Post Facto Clause applies at Guantanamo." Id. (italics in original).

[10] According to the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law § 702 and cmt. n (1987), a state violates a jus cogens norm if it as a matter of policy:

> [P]ractices, encourages, or condones (a) genocide, (b) slavery or slave trade, (c) the murder or causing the disappearance of individuals, (d) torture or other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, (e) international law asserts that by their nature, jus cogens violations apply even without a nation's consent (consent being the ordinary prerequisite to rules of customary international law).[11] In cases involving foreign officials sued for jus cogens violations of human rights, courts have held that individual immunity from suit does not exist. Finally, although the ATS has been held not to waive foreign states' sovereign immunity, Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428 (1989), the plaintiffs assert that "Congress has not enacted a similar comprehensive scheme regulating U.S. sovereign immunity for international law violations prosecuted in our own courts." And by this inaction, Congress has signaled that the United States is amenable to ATS suits.

The concurring opinion here finds this reasoning "logical," concludes that it has some force," and posits:

> [I]f there is a category of torts (violations of the law of nations, for example) that change the ordinary rules of sovereign immunity because these acts cannot be authorized by the sovereign, then a country either would lack any such immunity to waive or would not be prolonged arbitrary detention, (f) systematic racial discrimination, [or] (g) a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights.

[11] Vienna Conv. on the Law of Treaties, art. 53, May 23, 1969, 1155 U.N.T.S. 332, 8 I.L.M. 679 (jus cogens norm is "peremptory norm" of international law, "a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of states as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character"); see also Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law § 102 and cmt. k (1987).

> permitted to substitute for one of its officers.

Post at 142, 142–43, & 141 (Haynes, J., concurring). The concurrence asserts that this question has not been addressed by the panel opinion or the en banc compromise opinion that reinstates the panel decision. The concurrence believes this issue was left "unaddressed" in Sosa and suggests the Supreme Court take it up. Post at 141, 142–43.

With due respect, the plaintiffs' theory has yet to be adopted by any circuit court of appeals and has been repeatedly rejected, and that is because it has no valid foundation in the American constitutional structure, in the ATS, or in Supreme Court precedent. To effectuate their theory would create a breathtaking expansion of federal court authority, would abrogate federal sovereign immunity contrary to clearly established law, and would have severely adverse consequences for the conduct of American foreign affairs.

Taking the Supreme Court decisions first, Sosa did not consider U.S. sovereign immunity for ATS violations because the federal government was sued only under the Federal Tort Claims Act. 542 U.S. at 698, 124 S. Ct. at 2747. The ATS claim was alleged only against Sosa, a Mexican national, individually. Id. at 698, 124 S. Ct. at 2747. No issue of American sovereign immunity from ATS claims was presented for the Court to decide or even comment on. The overarching theme of Sosa, moreover, is one of caution, not expansion of federal court authority. Inferences that Sosa might leave open an implied waiver of sovereign immunity are implausible. First, the Court in Sosa held unanimously that the ATS is a strictly jurisdictional statute. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 714, 124 S. Ct. at 2755. It does not provide a substantive basis for aliens' general assertions of customary international law violations. Purely jurisdictional statutes do not waive sovereign immunity. United States v. Testan, 424 U.S. 392, 398, 96 S. Ct. 948, 953 (1976). Second, Sosa rejected the view that the ATS "ought to cover all [customary international law] claims, so long as they also qualify as torts" and instead gave "domestic legal force to an extremely limited subset of [customary international law] claims ... based on its reading of the specific intent of Congress." Al-Bihani v. Obama, 619 F.3d 1, 19 (D.C. Cir. 2010) (Kavanaugh, J., concurring in denial of rehearing en banc) (quoting Ernest A. Young, Sosa and the Retail Incorporation of International Law, 120 HARV. L.REV. F.. 28, 29 (2007)). According to Sosa, the only claims authorized by the ATS for violations of international law norms are those with no "less definite content and acceptance among civilized nations than the historical paradigms familiar when § 1350 was enacted." 542 U.S. at 732, 124 S. Ct. at 2765. In addition, "the determination whether a norm is sufficiently definite to support a cause of action should (and, indeed, invariably must) involve an element of judgment about the practical consequences of making that cause available to litigants in the federal courts." 542 U.S. at 732–33, 124 S. Ct. at 2766 (footnotes omitted). The Court went on to deny Alvarez's claim for arbitrary arrest and detention in violation of an international treaty and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. 542 U.S. at 738, 124 S. Ct. at 2769.

What does this cautionary opinion imply about federal sovereign immunity? As earlier noted, the Court decided in Amerada Hess that the FSIA "provides the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign state in federal court," 488 U.S. at 439, 109 S. Ct. at 690. The Court flatly rejected the argument that Congress, by failing explicitly to repeal the ATS when it amended the FSIA, had intended for federal courts to "continue to exercise jurisdiction over foreign states in suits alleging violations of international law outside the confines of the FSIA." 488 U.S. at 435, 109 S. Ct. at 689. That rejection would have been even more emphatic had the court considered whether the ATS waives the United States' sovereign immunity because, as then-Judge Scalia pointed out, foreign sovereign immunity rests only on international comity, while domestic sovereign immunity originates in the constitutional separation of powers. Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 207 n. 5 (D.C. Cir. 1985). The plaintiffs here err twice in asserting the abrogation of federal sovereign immunity under the ATS.

First, my colleagues' argument in the negative—that Congress silently reserved the defense of sovereign immunity against potential violations of international law in U.S. courts, has it backward about the ATS, just as the Court held with respect to foreign sovereign immunity in Amerada Hess. Federal sovereign immunity is the overarching principle, which must be explicitly waived by the federal government.[12] "[T]he United States cannot be sued at all without the consent of Congress." Block v. North Dakota ex rel. Bd. of Univ. & Sch. Lands, 461 U.S. 273, 287, 103 S. Ct. 1811, 1819 (1983). To consent, Congress must unequivocally waive sovereign immunity in statutory text; waiver will not be implied. Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 192, 116 S. Ct. 2092,

[12] This is exactly the point my colleagues fail to acknowledge. As they explain, because "Congress does not appear to have acted in the same way [as it did with the FSIA] to define federal court jurisdiction over suits against the United States by foreign nationals under the ATS," the ATS, as interpreted in Sosa, can deny the government its immunity. Post at 140–41 n. 12. But the United States' immunity from suit in federal courts is the rule, subject to explicit exceptions. Therefore, Congress need not do anything to preserve its sovereign immunity.

2096 (1996). As Judge Scalia held in Sanchez-Espinoza, "[i]t would make a mockery of the doctrine of sovereign immunity if federal courts were authorized to sanction or enjoin, by judgments nominally against present or former Executive officers, actions that are, concededly and as a jurisdictional necessity, official actions of the United States." 770 F.2d at 207 (emphasis in original).[13]

Second, they mistakenly confuse cases deriving from foreign official immunity, an immunity based on officials' status or conduct (and separate from the sovereign state's own immunity), with the constitutional principle involved in U.S. sovereign immunity. See, e.g., Yousuf v. Samantar, 699 F.3d 763 (4th Cir. 2012). No case has ever held the United States government has forfeited its sovereign immunity from suit because of any alleged violation of international law, whether jus cogens or otherwise. Nevertheless, they would expose the United States, alone among the nations of the world, to liability in federal courts under the ATS without the protection of sovereign immunity. Contrary to the plaintiffs' assertions, the Supreme Court's circumspect readings of the ATS in Sosa and Kiobel (rejecting ATS's extraterritorial application) offer no basis for the novel proposition that the ATS impliedly forfeits federal sovereign immunity.

Neither the plaintiffs nor the concurring opinion mentions that every other circuit court asked to hold the United States potentially liable under the ATS has [13] He qualified this statement by noting that, "These consequences are tolerated when the officer's action is unauthorized because contrary to statutory or constitutional prescription, but we think that exception can have no application when the basis for jurisdiction [under the ATS] requires action authorized by the sovereign as opposed to private wrongdoing." Id. (citation and footnote omitted).

declined the invitation. For example, in Tobar v. United States, 639 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2011), Ecuadorian nationals sued the United States under the ATS after the Coast Guard stopped, boarded, and detained their ship. The Ninth Circuit considered a number of statutes that might contain waivers of sovereign immunity, including the ATS. With respect to the ATS, the court held "[t]he Alien Tort Statute has been interpreted as a jurisdiction statute only—it has not been held to imply any waiver of sovereign immunity." Id. at 1196 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). This determination is particularly notable because it post-dates the Supreme Court's decision in Sosa.

The Fourth Circuit reached the same conclusion in Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. United States, 967 F.2d 965, 968 (4th Cir. 1992). The plaintiffs there asserted ATS claims against the United States government for property damage that occurred during the U.S. invasion of Panama. Once again, the government asserted its sovereign immunity, and the court agreed, holding that "any party asserting jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Statute must establish, independent of that statute, that the United States has consented to suit." Id.

So too for the D.C. Circuit. In Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202 (D.C. Cir. 1985), Nicaraguan citizens sued the United States for injuries incurred at the hands of the Contras. Id. at 205. The federal government asserted its sovereign immunity. Then-Judge Scalia held, in no uncertain terms, that "[t]he Alien Tort Statute itself is not a waiver of sovereign immunity." Id. at 207; see also Canadian Transp. Co. v. United States, 663 F.2d 1081, 1092 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

That these plaintiffs assert a violation of a jus cogens norm does not—and should not—change the outcome of the sovereign immunity analysis. The plaintiffs argue that jus cogens norms occupy such a high place in international law that their violation abrogates sovereign immunity. Other circuits to address such an argument have rejected it. In Matar v. Dichter, 563 F.3d 9, 14 (2d Cir.2009), the Second Circuit held that jus cogens norms cannot abrogate sovereign immunity when Congress has explicitly granted such immunity in the FSIA. It then broadly asserted that "[a] claim premised on the violation of jus cogens does not withstand foreign sovereign immunity." Id. at 15; see also Princz, 26 F.3d at 1174; Siderman, 965 F.2d at 718–719; Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 101 F.3d 239, 242–44 (2d Cir.1996). The same principle should apply to the constitutionally-footed doctrine of federal sovereign immunity. Given the unanimous decisions of the other circuits, there is no justification for a federal court's unilateral abrogation of our government's sovereign immunity under the ATS.

Returning once more to Sosa, it becomes clear that the Court, as it rejected Alvarez's broad claim for a violation of "the law of nations," fully realized the potentially untoward consequences of empowering lower courts to adopt a federal common law of international law torts. Not only did the Court limit the scope of such actions, but it also explained the difficulties that would ensue had it adopted Alvarez's facially appealing claim:

> Alvarez cites little authority that a rule so broad has the status of a binding customary norm today. He certainly cites nothing to justify the federal courts in taking his broad rule as the predicate for a federal lawsuit, for its implications would be breathtaking. His rule would support a cause of action in federal court for any arrest, anywhere in the world, unauthorized by the law of the jurisdiction > in which it took place, and would create a cause of action for any seizure of an alien in violation of the Fourth Amendment, supplanting the actions under Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and Bivens ..., that now provide damages remedies for such violations. It would create an action in federal court for arrests by state officers who simply exceed their authority; and for the violation of any limit that the law of any country might place on the authority of its own officers to arrest. And all of this assumes that Alvarez could establish that Sosa was acting on behalf of a government when he made the arrest, for otherwise he would need a rule broader still.

542 U.S. at 736–37, 124 S. Ct. at 2768 (footnote omitted).

> Whatever may be said for the broad principle Alvarez advances, in the present, imperfect world, it expresses an aspiration that exceeds any binding customary rule having the specificity we require.

542 U.S. at 738, 124 S. Ct. at 2769 (footnote omitted).

The parallels between these concerns and those attending a claim for "extrajudicial killing" are obvious. The plaintiffs' advocacy here of a broad rule clearly has implications for both domestic law enforcement and for the use of American lethal force in foreign confrontations. Such alleged violations of jus cogens could transform every use of deadly force by a federal officer against an alien into a litigable violation of a peremptory norm of international law, supplanting Bivens actions. These claims could also be asserted by aliens against state or local law enforcement officers, supplanting § 1983 actions. Finally, this alleged cause of action could be asserted directly against the United States, which contravenes federal sovereign immunity and is at odds with the FSIA immunity from suit every foreign nation enjoys in U.S. courts.

The existence of foreign sovereign immunity does not, however, eliminate the international complications of opening American courts to broad and vague claims under the ATS. As in Sosa, the plaintiffs' proffered rule "would support a cause of action in federal court for any [alleged extrajudicial killing], anywhere in the world." 542 U.S. at 736, 124 S. Ct. at 2768. Although certain jus cogens prohibitions, e.g. state-sponsored slavery or genocide, may be self-evidently within the scope of the Supreme Court's reasoning in Sosa, "[a]ny credible invocation of a principle against [extrajudicial killing] that the civilized world accepts as binding customary international law requires a factual basis beyond" mere conclusional pleadings. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 737, 124 S. Ct. at 2769. That a multiplicity of claims could aggravate relations with foreign nations and thwart the Executive and Legislative branches' discretion in conducting foreign affairs seems obvious and constitutes additional reasons, acknowledged in Sosa, for extreme caution in recognizing claims for breach of "the law of nations" actionable via the ATS. 542 U.S. at 727, 124 S. Ct. at 2763.

In sum, the plaintiffs' ATS claim against the United States is without foundation, and the concurring opinion should not be read as improvidently providing them support.

Conclusion

A "Lawless" U.S. Border?

One final point is necessary in response to the plaintiffs' assertion that enforcement of United States borders will become "lawless" if aliens in the position of Hernandez lose access to American civil tort recovery. This court must, of course, assume, based only on the pleadings, that Hernandez was the victim of an unprovoked shooting. The plaintiffs' assertion of official, or officially condoned lawlessness is, however, inaccurate. This tragedy neither should, nor has, escaped review. Numerous federal agencies, including the FBI, the Department of Homeland Security's Office of the Inspector General, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, and the United States Attorney's Office, investigated this incident and declined to indict Agent Mesa or grant extradition to Mexico under 18 U.S.C. § 3184. There were other possible avenues for evaluation of Agent Mesa's conduct. Plaintiffs could have sought federal court review of the Attorney General's scope of employment certification under the Westfall Act. See Gutierrez de Martinez v. Lamagno, 515 U.S. 417, 420, 115 S. Ct. 2227, 2229 (1995); see also Osborn v. Haley, 549 U.S. 225, 229–30, 127 S. Ct. 881, 887–88 (2007). Further, state systems may superintend excesses of federal executive authority. See 28 U.S.C. § 2679(d)(3). A judicially implied tort remedy under Bivens for constitutional violations or the Alien Tort Statute is not and was not the plaintiffs' only source of review for this tragedy.

I respectfully concur in the en banc opinion.

JAMES L. DENNIS, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment:

I join the en banc court's opinion in its entirety except as to its reason for denying Appellants' Fourth Amendment claim, with which I agree in result. I also join the concurring opinion of Judge Prado, except to the extent that it adopts the en banc court's reason for denying this claim. In United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), the Supreme Court apparently ruled that the phrase "the people" in the Fourth Amendment "refers to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this community to be considered part of that community." Id. at 265. I am inclined to agree, however, with those who have suggested that the Verdugo–Urquidez view cannot be squared with the Court's later holding in Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), that "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors, and practical concerns, not formalism." Id. at 764; see WAYNE R. LAFAVE ET AL., 2 CRIM. PROC. § 3.1(i) n. 237.1 (3d ed.2014) (citing Gerald L. Neuman, The Extraterritorial Constitution After Boumediene v. Bush, 82 S. CAL. L.REV. 259, 259, 272 (2008); Ellen S. The Mexican government has indicated that our adjudication of the Appellants' claims, whether under the Fourth or Fifth Amendment, in this particular case would not cause any friction with its sovereign interests. However, it appears that our judicial entanglement with extraterritorial Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims would be likely to involve impracticable and anomalous factors. For these reasons, I agree with the opinion of the court in declining to apply the Fourth Amendment to adjudicate the Appellants' claims but I do so out of concern for pragmatic and political questions rather than on a formal classification of the litigants involved.

EDWARD C. PRADO, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I agree with the en banc court's holding that the constitutional rights asserted by 15–year–old Sergio Hernández and his family were not clearly established in 2010, when Agent Mesa fired his fatal shots across the international border. However, I am compelled to write separately in response to Judge Jones's concurring opinion, which, in my view, sets forth an oversimplified and flawed analysis of the Fifth Amendment and the Supreme Court's extraterritoriality precedents. In her concurrence, Judge Jones offers an interpretation of the Fifth Amendment implications of Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), that is contrary to Supreme Court precedent and is certain to sow confusion in our circuit. Further, the concurrence rests on a reading of the Court's pivotal extraterritoriality rulings in Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), and Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), that sacrifices nuance for an unwarranted sense of certainty.

The facts in this case—though novel—are recurring, and similar lawsuits have begun percolating in the federal courts along the border.[1] Ultimately, it will be up to the Supreme Court to decide whether its broad statements in Boumediene apply to our border with Mexico and to provide clarity to law enforcement, civilians, and the federal courts tasked with interpreting the Court's seminal opinions on the extraterritorial reach of constitutional rights. Because the law is currently unclear, I join the en banc court's opinion in full and write separately only to respond to Judge Jones's concurring opinion.

I. The Applicability of the Fifth Amendment

The notion that the Fourth Amendment provides the exclusive means of relief for Hernández is rooted in a strained and incorrect reading of Graham v. Connor. The Court in Graham held that "all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure' of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its 'reasonableness' standard, rather than under a 'substantive due process' approach." 490 U.S. at 395. The Court explained that "[b]ecause the Fourth Amendment provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection against this sort of physically intrusive governmental conduct, that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of 'substantive due process,' must be the guide for analyzing these claims." Id.

[1] See, e.g., Rodriguez v. Unknown Parties, No. 4:14-cv-02251, 2014 WL 3734237 (D.Ariz. filed July 29, 2014).

Judge Jones's concurrence rightly points to these portions of the Court's opinion, but it elides key limiting phrases in each: "free citizen" and "explicit textual source." If, as the Court held in Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 274–75, the Fourth Amendment does not shield aliens located abroad (viz. non-"free citizens"), then it cannot provide "an explicit textual source of constitutional protection" to persons in Hernández's position, and Graham 's directive to apply the Fourth Amendment to covered excessive-force claims is simply inapt.

Indeed, as the Court explained in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259 (1997), "Graham ... does not hold that all constitutional claims relating to physically abusive government conduct must arise under either the Fourth or Eighth Amendments; rather, Graham simply requires that if a constitutional claim is covered by a specific constitutional provision, ... the claim must be analyzed under the standard appropriate to that specific provision, not under the rubric of substantive due process." Id. at 272 n. 7 (emphasis added). Subsequent cases have affirmed this view. See Cnty. of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 843 (1998) ("Substantive due process analysis is therefore inappropriate in this case only if respondents' claim is 'covered by' the Fourth Amendment. It is not."); Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 901 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[A] plaintiff whose claim is not susceptible to proper analysis with reference to a specific constitutional right may still state a claim under § 1983 for a violation of his or her Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right, and have the claim judged by the constitutional standard which governs that right.").[2]

[2] Apparently troubled by the implication that the Court in Graham excluded the class of claims at issue here from the presumptive coverage of the Fourth Amendment, Judge Jones's concurrence imputes a restrictive meaning to the Court's phrase "free citizens." According to the concurrence, the Court could not have intended to permit non-citizens to assert claims for excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment while limiting citizens to the Fourth Amendment. But this misses the point. Even if, as the concurrence suggests, the Court used this term in Graham—a case centering on the use of excessive force during an investigatory stop of a citizen, 490 U.S. at 388–89—to distinguish between the constitutional protections afforded to civilians, pretrial detainees, and incarcerated individuals, this says nothing about whether a claim that falls outside of these set boundaries is "covered by" the Fourth Amendment. Where, as here, a noncitizen alleges excessive force abroad, and there is no indication that the show of authority was directed at apprehension, it cannot be that the claim arises under the Fourth Amendment or not at all.

The cases the concurrence cites are not to the contrary. Cf. Lewis, 523 U.S. at 843–44 (holding that the passenger of a vehicle being pursued by police was not "seized" during a fatal collision and therefore could assert a substantive due process claim under the Fourteenth Amendment); Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 273–74 (1994) (declining to recognize a substantive due process right to be free from criminal prosecution without probable cause because the Fourth Amendment was drafted to address pretrial deprivations of liberty); Brower v. Cnty. of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596–99 (1989) (determining that the fatal use of a roadblock to terminate a suspect's flight constituted a seizure and observing that "a Fourth Amendment seizure does not occur whenever there is a governmentally caused termination of an individual's freedom of movement (the innocent passerby), nor even whenever there is a governmentally caused and governmentally desired termination of an individual's freedom of movement (the fleeing felon), but only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied."); Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 3, 7 (1985) (analyzing the apprehension of a fleeing suspect through the use of deadly force as a seizure).

apprehend Hernández—he detained one of Hernández's companions, then fired his service weapon into Mexico, where Hernández hid behind the pillar of a bridge, and he ultimately left Hernández's body where it lay. Under Verdugo-Urquidez and Lewis, the Fourth Amendment does not "cover" this claim of excessive force. I would therefore hold that Hernández may invoke the Fifth Amendment's prohibition on constitutionally arbitrary official conduct.

II. The Extraterritoriality of the Fifth Amendment

Judge Jones's concurrence paints our extraterritoriality case law in broad strokes, with a palette of black and white. The state of the law, as the concurrence views it, permits no gray.[3] According to the concurrence, the Constitution cannot apply

[3] The absolutism of the concurrence's analytical framework is epitomized by its phrasing of the constitutional issue in this case: "United States constitutional rights do not extend to aliens who (a) lack any connection to the United States and (b) are injured on foreign soil." All nuance is lost, and only one conclusion follows from the question presented. But there is no question that Hernández had some connection to the United States, even if not the "significant voluntary connection" required to invoke the protections of the Fourth Amendment under Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 271, by virtue of the acts of Agent Mesa that originated in the United States and had their effect in Mexico. Likewise, it is misguided to focus exclusively on Hernández's location within Mexico when the bullets Agent Mesa fired from United States soil found their target. This is not a case involving a drone strike, an act of war on a distant battlefield, or law-enforcement conduct occurring entirely within another nation's territory; it is a fatal shooting by small-arms fire in which the short distance separating those involved was bisected by an international border. These distinct facts cast doubt on the concurrence's simplistic framework and belie its warning that this case implicates "our nation's applications of force abroad."

extraterritorially to the facts of this case because the Supreme Court has held, generally, that the Fourth and Fifth Amendments do not apply to noncitizens with no significant voluntary connection to the United States. Citing Eisentrager and Verdugo-Urquidez, the concurrence asserts that the Supreme Court has foreclosed the question before our Court. This uncomplicated view of extraterritoriality fails to exhibit due regard for the Court's watershed opinion in Boumediene, which not only authoritatively interpreted these earlier cases but also announced the bedrock standards for determining the extraterritorial reach of the Constitution—not just the writ of habeas corpus. Applying these standards, I would hold the Fifth Amendment applicable to the particular facts alleged by Hernández.

In Boumediene, the Court provided its clearest and most definitive articulation of the principles governing the application of constitutional provisions abroad. Although the Court was tasked with deciding the narrow question of whether aliens designated enemy combatants and detained at Guantanamo Bay had the constitutional privilege of habeas corpus, Justice Kennedy wrote a lengthy opinion for the Court that grappled with the foundations of extraterritoriality. The Court first discussed its sparse extraterritoriality precedents and found them to undermine "the Government's argument that, at least as applied to noncitizens, the Constitution necessarily stops where de jure sovereignty ends." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 755 (emphasis added). Rather, the Court read beyond the bare holdings of these cases and concluded that they shared a common thread: "the idea that questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism."

Id. at 764.[4] Based on these considerations, the Court identified at least three factors that were relevant in determining the reach of the Suspension Clause: (1) the citizenship and status of the detainee and the quality of the process underlying this finding; (2) the nature of the sites where the apprehension and detention occurred;

[4] Critically, while explaining its reasoning, the Court repeatedly cited Justice Kennedy's concurring opinion in Verdugo–Urquidez, in which he advocated a functional analysis of extraterritoriality. Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 759–62. In Verdugo–Urquidez, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment had no application to DEA agents' warrantless search of a Mexican citizen's residences in Mexico. 494 U.S. at 262, 274–75. Although he agreed with the Court's ultimate conclusion that no Fourth Amendment violation had occurred, Justice Kennedy wrote separately to express his view that the reach of the Constitution is not confined by the identity of the class of persons that ratified the instrument or by the text used to denominate those subject to its protection (e.g., "the people"). Id. at 275–76 (Kennedy, J., concurring). Rather, Justice Kennedy urged a functional approach to extraterritoriality—one that he traced as far back as In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891), the Insular Cases (e.g., Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901), Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197 (1903), Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138 (1904), and Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 (1922)), and Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 74 (1957) (Harlan, J., concurring). See id. at 277–78 ("These [extraterritoriality] authorities ... stand for the proposition that we must interpret constitutional protections in light of the undoubted power of the United States to take actions to assert its legitimate power and authority abroad."); id. at 278 (analyzing the extraterritorial reach of the Fourth Amendment by determining whether "[t]he conditions and considerations of this case would make adherence to the [Amendment] ... impracticable and anomalous").

The significance of this opinion, which evinces Justice Kennedy's dedication to applying a functional approach to extraterritoriality even in a U.S.-Mexico cross-border law-enforcement context, cannot be understated. And it hardly bears repeating here that Justice Kennedy cast the deciding vote in both Verdugo–Urquidez and Boumediene.

and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in determining the detainee's entitlement to the writ. Id. at 766. After analyzing these factors, the Court held that the Suspension Clause "has full effect at Guantanamo Bay." Id. at 771.

This holding may have been limited to the Suspension Clause, but the Court's reasoning was decidedly not so constricted. Justice Kennedy's opinion drew from the analysis of numerous rights in numerous contexts other than habeas, id. at 755–64, framing its review of the case law as a survey of the Court's discussions of "the Constitution's extraterritorial application," id. at 755 (emphasis added). More importantly, when the Court rejected the Government's proffered reading of Eisentrager—the case that Judge Jones's concurrence cites as facially foreclosing Hernández's Fifth Amendment claim[5]—it announced in [5] As Boumediene recognized, the ruling in Eisentrager cannot reasonably be divorced from its idiosyncratic facts: the extension of Fifth Amendment rights and the writ of habeas corpus to alleged members of the German armed forces who were captured in China, convicted of violating the laws of war, and imprisoned in occupied, post-World War II Germany. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 762–64. If the enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay were not sufficiently similar to the petitioners in Eisentrager to be bound by that case, then Hernández—an unarmed fifteen-year-old boy with the misfortune of standing on the wrong side of an international border—certainly is not.

Furthermore, while Judge Jones's concurrence is quick to emphasize Boumediene 's limited holding, it is conspicuously silent as to the significance of Eisentrager 's equally narrow ruling. See Eisentrager, 339 U.S. at 785 ("We hold that the Constitution does not confer a right of personal security or an immunity from military trial and punishment upon an alien enemy engaged in the hostile service of a government at war with the United States."). In any event, my point is not that Boumediene overruled Eisentrager, but that the 2008 case offers us the Court's authoritative reading of the no uncertain terms that "[n]othing in Eisentrager says that de jure sovereignty is or has ever been the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution or of habeas corpus." Id. at 764 (emphasis added).[6]

Boumediene, and its functionality-focused reading of the Court's previous extraterritoriality decisions, is instructive here. Confronted with a novel extraterritoriality question, we must apply the only appropriate analytical framework the Court has given us: the Boumediene factors. Adapted to the present context, three objective factors and practical concerns are relevant to our extraterritoriality determination: (1) the citizenship and status of the claimant, (2) the nature of the location where the constitutional violation occurred, and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in enforcing the claimed right. Cf. id. at 766–71.[7] The 1950 case—one that eschews a formalistic approach to extraterritoriality. It is this interpretation of Eisentrager—according to which the case must be understood as consistent with the functional approach endorsed in Boumediene—that must guide our analysis.

[6] Even if these statements were mere dicta, we and our fellow circuits have long recognized that the Supreme Court's words carry special weight. See Schwab v. Crosby, 451 F.3d 1308, 1325–26 (11th Cir. 2006) (noting that the court has "previously recognized that dicta from the Supreme Court is not something to be lightly cast aside" and citing cases from eleven circuits expressing the deference owed to Supreme Court dicta (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)); United States v. Becton, 632 F.2d 1294, 1296 n. 3 (5th Cir. 1980) ("We are not bound by dicta, even of our own court.... Dicta of the Supreme Court are, of course, another matter.").

[7] Judge Jones's concurrence is of course correct that Professor Neuman, "a defender of th[e] prediction" that Boumediene may be extended to other constitutional provisions, has acknowledged "the need for refinements of the three-factor functional test." But that is exactly what the panel majority's original opinion suggested, see relevant practical obstacles include the consequences for U.S. actions abroad, the substantive rules that would govern the claim, and the likelihood that a favorable ruling would lead to friction with another country's government. See id.; Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 273–74; id. at 278 (Kennedy, J., concurring). As the panel majority's original opinion explained, the Boumediene factors, coupled with an analysis of the operation, text, and history of the Fifth Amendment, militate in favor of the extraterritorial application of substantive due process protections on these facts. See Hernández v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 259–63, 267–72 (5th Cir. 2014), vacated in part and reinstated in part on reh'g en banc, 785 F.3d 117 (5th Cir. 2015).

In sum, were we to reach the constitutional merits, I would hold, as the vacated panel majority's opinion did, Hernández, 757 F.3d at 272, that a noncitizen situated immediately beyond our nation's borders may invoke the Hernández v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 262 (5th Cir. 2014), vacated in part and reinstated in part on reh'g en banc, 785 F.3d 117 (5th Cir. 2015), and what federal courts of appeals are uniquely well-equipped to propound—refinements that are faithful to the Court's opinion, which described the factors as non-exclusive and derived them from contexts in addition to habeas, see Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766. Moreover, Professor Neuman also reads Boumediene as a case with implications beyond habeas corpus, and he has expressed optimism about the expansion of Justice Kennedy's functional approach. See Gerald L. Neuman, Essay, Extraterritoriality and the Interest of the United States in Regulating its Own, 99 Cornell L.Rev. 1441, 1458, 1470 (2014) (observing that "[a]lthough the holding of Boumediene concerned the Suspension Clause, Justice Kennedy described his functional approach as an overall framework derived from precedents involving a variety of constitutional rights," and concluding that "[t]he selective functional approach of Boumediene v. Bush should be developed and strengthened to reconcile commitment to constitutional values with the extraterritorial exercise of power").

protection of the Fifth Amendment against the arbitrary use of lethal small-arms force by a U.S. government official standing on U.S. soil. To hold otherwise would enshrine an unsustainably strict, territorial approach to constitutional rights—one the Supreme Court rejected in Boumediene.[8]

III. Conclusion

Contrary to Judge Jones's concurrence, I believe that the "path of least resistance" presents a prudent course for the en banc court. The depth of our disagreement about the meaning of Boumediene, Verdugo-Urquidez, and Eisentrager is compelling evidence that the law was not clearly established at the time of the tragic events

[8] Disturbingly, such a narrow approach could also create zones of lawlessness where the fortuity of one's location at the time of a gunshot would mark the boundary between liability and impunity. This would result, in turn, in perverse and disturbing incentives for government agents confronted with noncitizen migrants near the border. Because directing lethal force into Mexico would violate no constitutional norms, a government agent resorting to deadly force would have every reason to fire his weapon before the migrant reaches the U.S. border, or after the migrant crosses back into Mexico, to avoid possible civil liability. By contrast, if the agent shoots while the migrant is in U.S. territory, then the Constitution is suddenly—and undesirably—implicated. And it goes without saying that if the scenario were reversed, and Mexican government agents were firing weapons across the border into the United States, unyielding conceptions of territoriality would likely fall by the wayside.

Judge Jones's concurrence disputes the characterization of the border region as "lawless," citing the governmental investigations into Hernández's fatal shooting. But the fact that the United States "declined to indict Agent Mesa or grant extradition to Mexico" speaks not to the promise of accountability but to the practical obstacles associated with the criminal and political processes that exist to regulate official conduct.

giving rise to this suit. But to affirmatively find no constitutional violation on these facts—which are without parallel in our precedents—requires a troublingly uncomplicated reading of the governing law. Just as Graham cannot be understood without Lanier and Lewis, Verdugo-Urquidez and Eisentrager cannot be understood without Boumediene. Reading these cases in context and with due regard for the novel facts presented here, it is evident that Agent Mesa's fatal cross-border shooting of Sergio Hernández cannot be painted in the simple black and white prevalent in Judge Jones's concurrence. It requires a shade of gray that only a careful engagement with our precedents and the record in this case can produce.

Were we in a position to reach the constitutional merits, I would hold that Agent Mesa's actions violated Hernández's Fifth Amendment right to be free from constitutionally arbitrary government conduct. But until the Supreme Court intervenes to clarify the reach of Boumediene and apply Justice Kennedy's functional test to these distinct facts, I remain satisfied that the en banc court has wisely resolved this appeal on clearly-established-law grounds.

I respectfully concur in the en banc opinion.

CATHARINA HAYNES, Circuit Judge, joined by SOUTHWICK and HIGGINSON, Circuit Judges, concurring:

I concur in the judgment of the court.[1] I write separately to address the question of sovereign

[1] I also concur in the reasoning of the en banc opinion as immunity for the United States in more detail. As the reinstated panel opinion correctly notes, the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS") is a jurisdictional statute but is not "stillborn." Hernandez, 757 F.3d at 258; Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 714 (2004). It provides a forum in United States courts for tort claims by aliens alleging a violation of "the law of nations."[2] 28 U.S.C. § 1350. The panel majority opinion nonetheless determines that Congress must explicitly waive sovereign immunity to make such torts committed in violation of the "law of nations" actionable against the United States (substituted for one of its officers)—as eloquently described in the special concurrence filed by Judge Jones ("Special Concurrence").[3] That may be a fair supplemented herein.

[2] The parties and panel majority opinion focus on whether sovereign immunity bars an ATS suit, rather than on whether killing an unarmed civilian without any provocation or just cause would violate the types of international norms contemplated by the ATS in the phrase "law of nations." See, e.g., Hernandez, 757 F.3d at 259 (assuming arguendo that Plaintiffs averred a violation of the "law of nations" the ATS would recognize by alleging "that the United States violated the international prohibition against 'extrajudicial killings' "). For purposes of this discussion, I will assume that killing a civilian without any provocation or just cause would violate the law of nations, as did the panel majority opinion. Id.

[3] Because Mesa's conduct occurred in the United States, I do not view Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 133 S. Ct. 1659 (2013), cited by the government here, as barring an action under the ATS. See id. at 1669 ("[A]ll the relevant conduct took place outside the United States," such that the ATS did not provide a United States forum for the international tort claimed in that case); see also id. at 1670 (Alito, J., concurring) ("[A] putative ATS cause of action will fall within the scope of the presumption against extraterritoriality ... unless the domestic conduct is sufficient to violate an international law norm that satisfies Sosa 's requirements of definiteness and acceptance among civilized nations.").

understanding of the current state of the law in this area. But I wish to address some undeveloped implications of what the Supreme Court has so far held, above all in its extended treatment of the ATS in Sosa.

As the panel majority opinion notes, Sosa holds that federal courts can recognize a "limited" number of international common law torts that fall within the rubric of the ATS. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 712. Left unaddressed is the question of whether any such common law torts would make the sovereign immunity of the United States unavailable. Put another way, if the United States has sovereign immunity as the Special Concurrence asserts, then I agree that it must be expressly waived in order for a lawsuit such as this one to be viable. But if there is a category of torts (violations of the law of nations, for example) that change the ordinary rules of sovereign immunity because these acts cannot be authorized by the sovereign, then a country either would lack any such immunity to waive or would not be permitted to substitute for one of its officers.

The Fourth Circuit recently discussed this possibility, noting in the context of foreign official immunity:

> Unlike private acts that do not come within the scope of foreign official immunity, jus cogens violations may well be committed under color of law and, in that sense, constitute acts performed in the course of the foreign official's employment by the Sovereign. However, as a matter of international and domestic law, jus cogens violations are, by definition, acts that are not officially authorized by the Sovereign.

Yousuf v. Samantar, 699 F.3d 763, 775–76 (4th Cir. 2012) (citing Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina,[4] 965 F.2d 699, 718 (9th Cir. 1992) ("International law does not recognize an act that violates jus cogens as a sovereign act.")).

In turn, jus cogens norms are a form of customary international law, a term often used instead of the phrase "law of nations." See generally Gwynne L. Skinner, Roadblocks to Remedies: Recently Developed Barriers to Relief for Aliens Injured by U.S. Officials, Contrary to the Founders' Intent, 47 U. RICH. L.REV.. 555, 565 (2013) ("The ATS gives federal courts jurisdiction over tort claims brought by aliens for violations of the law of nations, a term now seen as synonymous with customary international law."); Ernest A. Young, Sorting Out the Debate over Customary International Law, 42 VA. J. INT'L L. 365, 448 (2002) ("[M]ost courts [interpreting the ATS] seem to have limited the scope of actionable customary international law to fundamental or jus cogens norms...."); Justin D. Cummins, Invigorating Labor: A Human Rights Approach in the United States, 19 EMORY INT'L L.REV. 1, 5 n. 12 (2005) ("Jus cogens 'is now widely accepted ... as a principle of customary law (albeit of higher status).' " (quoting RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF FOREIGN RELATIONS § 102 n. 6)); cf. Siderman, 965 F.2d at 715 (noting that jus cogens differs from customary international law in that "customary international law derives solely from the consent of states, [while] the fundamental and universal norms constituting jus cogens [derive from customary laws considered binding on all nations and] transcend such consent, as exemplified by the theories underlying the judgments of the Nuremberg tribunals following World War II"); Sanchez–Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 206–07 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (Scalia, Circuit J.) (describing "the law of nations [as] so-called customary international law, arising from the customs and usages of civilized nations" (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)).

[4] At issue in Siderman was a foreign state's immunity from suit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"), 28 U.S.C. § 1602 et seq. 965 F.2d at 718–19. The Siderman court's discussion of jus cogens supports the views expressed in this concurrence; yet, that court ultimately found that it had no jurisdiction over a foreign state (Argentina) because the Supreme Court in Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corporation, 488 U.S. 428, 433 (1989), has interpreted the FSIA as a complete and exclusive scheme governing foreign state immunity in U.S. courts. See Siderman, 965 F.2d at 718–19; see also Amerada Hess, 488 U.S. at 433–34 (noting the Court "start[ed] from the settled proposition that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the lower federal courts is determined by Congress in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good" and holding that "the text and structure of the FSIA demonstrate Congress' intention that the FSIA be the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign state in our courts" (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)). Congress does not appear to have acted in the same way to define federal court jurisdiction over suits against the United States by foreign nationals under the ATS, except through the ATS itself. Therefore, it is imperative to consider jus cogens and its impact on the United States's immunity in light of the Court's painstaking interpretation of the ATS in Sosa and the common law torts recognized therein.

Although not all jus cogens norms may fall within the category of international common law torts that federal courts can recognize under Sosa, it seems logical that cognizable jus cogens norms may preclude a sovereign immunity defense. Cf. Thomas H. Lee, The Safe–Conduct Theory of the Alien Tort Statute, 106 COLUM. L.REV.. 830, 879–82, 890–95, 901–08 (2006) (analyzing history, Sosa, and legislative documents from the founding era to postulate about which international common law torts are cognizable under the ATS); Sarah H. Cleveland, The Kiobel Presumption and Extraterritoriality, 52 COLUM. J. TRANSNAT'L L.. 8, 17–19 (2013) (similar, but arguing for a more expansive view of which torts are cognizable, especially in the extraterritorial context); cf. also The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 700–01 (1900) ("International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction...."); Estate of Amergi ex rel. Amergi v. Palestinian Auth., 611 F.3d 1350, 1363–64 (11th Cir. 2010) (describing the type of international tort that federal courts may recognize under the ATS and Sosa). Plaintiffs raise this argument—that sovereign immunity may be unavailable for a category of jus cogens torts or other violations of the law of nations—but neither the reinstated panel nor the en banc opinion addresses it.

Sosa also did not address sovereign immunity vis-à-vis the ATS. In that case, the Court only considered the claims of a foreign national named Alvarez–Machain that he was kidnapped by another foreign national, Sosa, at the behest of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA"). 542 U.S. at 698–99. The Court ultimately held that the alleged international norm in question was insufficient to support a claim under the common law underlying the ATS. Id. at 712. Sosa 's language, however, hints at the idea that the ATS contemplated something broader than merely giving jurisdiction for an action Congress authorizes: "[T]here is every reason to suppose that the First Congress did not pass the ATS as a jurisdictional convenience to be placed on the shelf for use by a future Congress...." Id. at 719.

Unlike Sosa, here the United States was substituted for Mesa under the Westfall Act. Plaintiffs could have sought (but did not seek) federal-court review of the Attorney General's scope-of-employment certification under the Westfall Act. See Gutierrez de Martinez v. Lamagno, 515 U.S. 417, 420 (1995); see also Osborn v.

Haley, 549 U.S. 225 (2007). Indeed, given Plaintiffs' argument that jus cogens violations are not legitimate official acts, Plaintiffs may have had a strong basis for raising such a challenge.[5] See, e.g., Yousuf, 699 F.3d at 776 (distinguishing between status- and conduct-based immunity). Moreover, I note that the Special Concurrence does not take issue with the observation that Plaintiffs chose not to pursue this viable option for challenging Mesa's conduct.

I conclude that Plaintiffs' argument on sovereign immunity and the ATS has some force. But in this area of great delicacy involving international diplomacy and United States sovereign immunity, I believe it is best to leave this issue to the Supreme Court or at least to a court more appropriately positioned to address these intricate issues. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 725 ("[T]here are good reasons for a restrained conception of the discretion a federal court should exercise in considering a new cause of action of this kind."); id. at 728 (similar); see also id. at 750 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (decrying the notion that lower federal courts will be determining "perceived international norms"). Accordingly, I concur in the judgment of the en banc court.

[5] Thus, Plaintiffs' concern that people in Mesa's situation can commit wrongful acts with impunity is not accurate. A Bivens action does not stand alone as Plaintiffs' last resort to seek review of this tragedy. In addition to challenging the substitution by the United States, Plaintiffs may be able to seek redress in Mexican courts or through Mexican diplomatic channels. See 18 U.S.C. § 3184. State processes may also be available. See 28 U.S.C. § 2679(d)(3). Finally, Congress has exemplars both for establishing a compensation system for victims of United States government overseas torts, see 21 U.S.C. § 904, and also for waiving foreign sovereign immunity, see 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a).

JAMES E. GRAVES, JR., Circuit Judge, concurring in part:

I agree with the majority that the Fifth Amendment right was not clearly established at the time of the incident. But I also join, in part, the concurring opinion of Judge Prado, except to the extent that it adopts the en banc court's reasons for denying the Fourth Amendment claim. Additionally, I join, in part, Judges Dennis and Haynes in concluding that the plaintiffs' claims under the Fourth Amendment and the Alien Tort Statute (ATS) have force. However, I disagree with the conclusions of Judges Dennis and Haynes that this court should forego the adjudication of such claims.[1] Instead, I would conclude that this court should carefully adjudicate the ATS and Fourth Amendment claims. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 712–13, 724–26; and 28 U.S.C. § 1350. For these reasons, I respectfully concur with the majority opinion in part and join the separate opinions of Judges Dennis, Prado and Haynes in part.

---

[1] I also disagree with Judge Haynes' concurrence to the extent that it lists various other forms of review or redress which are, for the most part, unavailable, ineffective, or do not provide the same relief as a Bivens action.

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas

June 30, 2014

Before DeMOSS, DENNIS, and PRADO, Circuit Judges.

EDWARD C. PRADO, Circuit Judge:

This case involves a foreign national's attempt to invoke constitutional protection for an injury that occurred outside the United States. United States Border Patrol Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr. ("Agent Mesa"), standing in the United States, shot and killed Sergio Adrian Hernandez ("Hernandez") Guereca, a Mexican citizen, standing in Mexico. Hernandez's family sued, asserting a number of claims against the United States, the border patrol agent, and the agent's supervisors. For the following reasons, we AFFIRM the judgments in favor of the United States and the supervisors, but we REVERSE the judgment in favor of the border patrol agent.

I. BACKGROUND

Appellants' complaint sets forth the following factual allegations. On June 7, 2010, Sergio Adrian Hernandez Guereca, a fifteen-year-old Mexican national, was gathered with a group of friends on the Mexican side of a cement culvert that separates the United States and Mexico.[1] Hernandez and his friends were playing a game that involved running up the incline of the culvert, touching the barbed-wire fence separating Mexico and the United States, and then running back down the incline. As they were playing, United States Border Patrol Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr. arrived on the scene and detained one of Hernandez's friends, causing Hernandez to retreat "beneath the pillars of the Paso del Norte

[1] The culvert is located near the Paso del Norte Bridge in El Paso, Texas.

Bridge" in Mexico to observe. Agent Mesa, still standing in the United States, then fired at least two shots at Hernandez, one of which struck him in the face and killed him.

Hernandez's parents, Jesus C. Hernandez and Maria Guadalupe Guereca Bentacour ("the Appellants"), sued, asserting eleven claims against the United States, Agent Mesa, and unknown federal employees. They brought the first seven claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA") based on multiple allegations of tortious conduct.[2] Their next two claims asserted that the United States and the unknown federal employees had violated Hernandez's Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights by knowingly adopting inadequate procedures regarding the use of deadly force and by failing to adopt adequate procedures regarding the use of reasonable force in effecting arrests. Their tenth claim asserted that Agent Mesa was liable under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), for violating Hernandez's Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights through the use of "excessive, deadly force." Finally, for their eleventh claim, the Appellants invoked the district court's jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), alleging that Hernandez "was shot in contravention of international treaties, conventions and the Laws of Nations."

[2] Specifically, the FTCA claims were based on (1) assault and battery, (2) negligence, (3) Agent Mesa's use of excessive and deadly force, (4) the negligent adoption of policies that violated Hernandez's rights, (5) the negligent failure to adopt policies that would have protected Hernandez's rights, (6) the intentional adoption of policies that violated Hernandez's rights, and (7) the intentional failure to adopt policies that would have protected Hernandez's rights.

The United States moved to dismiss the claims against it, which included all claims except for the Bivens action against Agent Mesa. As a preliminary matter, the district court determined that under the Westfall Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2679, the United States was the only proper defendant for the common law tort claims because Agent Mesa was acting in the course and scope of his employment. The Appellants did not dispute this determination, and the court substituted the United States as the only party-defendant for those claims. See 28 U.S.C. § 2679(b)(1) (establishing an FTCA claim against the United States as the exclusive remedy for any tort claim based on the acts of a government employee acting in the course and scope of his employment). The district court then granted the motion to dismiss, holding that the United States had not waived sovereign immunity for these claims under either the FTCA or the ATS.

After the court dismissed the claims against the United States, the Appellants amended their complaint to add four Bivens actions against Agent Mesa's supervisors—Ramiro Cordero, Scott Luck, Victor Manjarrez, Jr., and Carla Provost. The Appellants asserted that these supervisors violated Hernandez's Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights "by tolerating and condoning a pattern of brutality and excessive force by Border Patrol agents; systematically failing to properly and adequately monitor and investigate incidents of brutality or supervise and discipline officers involved in such misconduct; creating an environment to shield agents from liability for their wrongful conduct; and inadequately training officers and agents regarding the appropriate use and restraint of their firearms as weapons." Additionally, the Appellants alleged that the supervisors "had actual and/or constructive knowledge" that Agent Mesa's conduct "posed [a] pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury" and that their response to such knowledge was "so inadequate as to show deliberate indifference or tacit authorization of alleged offensive practices."

Shortly thereafter, Agent Mesa moved to dismiss the claims against him, asserting qualified immunity and arguing that Hernandez, as an alien injured outside the United States, lacked Fourth or Fifth Amendment protections. The district court agreed and dismissed the claims against Agent Mesa. Specifically, the court relied on United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), to hold that Hernandez could not invoke the Fourth Amendment's protection because he was an alien with no voluntary ties to the United States. The court found Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), inapplicable because Boumediene said nothing about "the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures." The court then dismissed the Appellants' Fifth Amendment claim, holding under Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), that excessive force claims should be analyzed only under the Fourth Amendment.

Finally, the supervisors sought dismissal of, or alternatively summary judgment on, the remaining Bivens action against them. The supervisors argued that the Appellants had failed to adequately allege a violation of clearly established Fourth or Fifth Amendment rights and that, even if they had, the supervisors were not personally responsible for any constitutional violation. The Appellants responded by voluntarily dismissing Agent Luck and Agent Provost. The district court then granted summary judgment for the remaining defendants, Agent Cordero and Agent Manjarrez, holding that the Appellants had failed to show "that the Defendants were personally involved in the June 7 incident" or that there was a causal link "between the Defendants' acts or omissions and a violation of Hernandez's rights."[3] The court noted that Agent Cordero had not supervised agents in Agent Mesa's position "since 2006–four years before the June 7 incident." Additionally, Agent Manjarrez was transferred to a different sector from Agent Mesa's "eight months before the June 7 incident." The court found both of these gaps created "too remote a time period to raise a genuine issue of material fact that [the supervisors'] actions or omissions proximately caused [the Appellants'] harm."[4]

The Appellants timely appealed each adverse judgment, and we consolidated the appeals for review.[5]

II. CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

A. Federal Tort Claims Act

We begin with the claims asserted against the United States, specifically those asserted under the FTCA. The FTCA "is a limited waiver of sovereign immunity, making the Federal Government liable to the same

---

[3] The court assumed for the sake of argument that the Appellants were entitled to invoke Fourth and Fifth Amendment protections in their claims against the supervisors.

[4] The district court also denied the Appellants' request to seek discovery for the limited purpose of uncovering the names of other individuals who had supervised Agent Mesa so that they could file a fourth amended complaint naming the new defendants. Appellants do not argue on appeal that the court abused its discretion in denying their request.

[5] We have jurisdiction over all three appeals under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Both the decision to grant a motion to dismiss and the decision to grant summary judgment are reviewed de novo. Bass v. Stryker Corp., 669 F.3d 501, 506 (5th Cir. 2012); Buffalo Marine Servs. Inc. v. United States, 663 F.3d 750, 753 (5th Cir. 2011).

extent as a private party for certain torts of federal employees acting within the scope of their employment." United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807, 813 (1976). The FTCA accordingly gives federal courts jurisdiction over claims against the United States for "personal injury or death caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the Government while acting within the scope of his office or employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred." 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b)(1). The FTCA "also limits its waiver of sovereign immunity in a number of ways." Sosa v. Alvarez–Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 700 (2004). The relevant limitation on the waiver of immunity here is the FTCA exception for "[a]ny claim arising in a foreign country." 28 U.S.C. § 2680(k).

The Supreme Court analyzed the scope of the FTCA's foreign country exception in Sosa. There, the DEA hired Mexican nationals to seize a Mexican physician believed to have participated in the interrogation and torture of a DEA agent. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 697–98. The physician was abducted from his house in Mexico, held overnight in a motel, and then brought to El Paso, where he was arrested by federal officers. Id. at 698. Upon his return to Mexico, the physician sued the United States for false arrest under the FTCA. Id. The Ninth Circuit held the United States liable under California law because the DEA had no authority to effect the physician's arrest and detention in Mexico. Id. at 699.

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the FTCA's foreign country exception barred the claim. See id. at 712. The Court noted that some courts of appeals had allowed similar actions to proceed under what was known as the "headquarters doctrine," which provided that "the foreign country exception [would] not exempt the United States from suit for acts or omissions occurring here which have their operative effect in another country." Id. at 701 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court, however, viewed this doctrine as inconsistent with the plain language of the foreign country exception. See id. Specifically, the Court found good reason "to conclude that Congress understood a claim 'arising in a foreign country' to be a claim for injury or harm occurring in a foreign country." Id. at 704. When the FTCA was passed, "the dominant principle in choice-of-law analysis for tort cases was lex loci delicti: courts generally applied the law of the place where the injury occurred." Id. at 705. Thus, for plaintiffs injured in a foreign country, "the presumptive choice in American courts under the traditional rule would have been to apply foreign law to determine the tortfeasor's liability." Id. at 706. This was the exact result "Congress intended to avoid by the foreign country exception." Id. at 707. The headquarters doctrine, then, was inappropriate because its application would "result in a substantial number of cases applying the very foreign law the foreign country exception was meant to avoid." Id. at 710. As a result, the Court rejected the headquarters doctrine and held "that the FTCA's foreign country exception bars all claims based on any injury suffered in a foreign country, regardless of where the tortious act or omission occurred." Id. at 712.

Here, it is undisputed that Hernandez was standing in Mexico when he was shot. Nevertheless, the Appellants argue that Hernandez's injury occurred in the United States. Specifically, the Appellants assert an assault claim and contend that "once the gun has been cocked and aimed and the finger is on the trigger, it is not necessary to wait until the bullet strikes to invoke assault." But at all relevant times, Hernandez was standing in Mexico. Any claim will therefore necessarily be based on an injury suffered in a foreign country. Accordingly, these tort claims are barred by the foreign country exception under Sosa.[6]

B. Alien Tort Statute

The final claim against the United States was brought under the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), 28 U.S.C. § 1350. The ATS provides that "[t]he district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 1350. The Supreme Court has held that the ATS is a jurisdictional statute only and does not create a new cause of action for torts in violation of international law. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 713–14. The fact that the ATS does not establish a cause of action does not mean that the ATS has no effect. See id. at 714 (rejecting the argument that "the ATS was stillborn ... without a further statute expressly authorizing adoption of causes of action"). Instead, courts are authorized under the ATS to "recognize private causes of action for certain torts in violation of the law of nations." Id. at 724. This authorization reflects the Supreme Court's belief that the First Congress enacted the ATS "on the understanding that the common law would provide a cause of action for the modest number of international law violations with a potential for personal liability at the time." Id. Courts must exercise restraint, however, in [6] The Appellants also asserted in their eighth and ninth claims that the United States was liable under the U.S. Constitution. The district court correctly determined that the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for constitutional torts, and the Appellants have not addressed the constitutional claims against the United States on appeal.

considering these causes of action and "should require any claim based on the present-day law of nations to rest on a norm of international character accepted by the civilized world and defined with a specificity comparable to the features of the 18th-century paradigms" the Court recognized. Id. at 725.

The Appellants believe they have satisfied this standard by alleging that the United States violated the international prohibition against "extrajudicial killings." Even assuming that to be the case, the Appellants still must show that the United States has waived sovereign immunity for this claim. Other courts to address this issue have held that the ATS does not imply any waiver of sovereign immunity. See, e.g., Tobar v. United States, 639 F.3d 1191, 1196 (9th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he Alien Tort Statute has been interpreted as a jurisdiction statute only—it has not been held to imply any waiver of sovereign immunity." (alteration in original)); Goldstar (Pan.) S.A. v. United States, 967 F.2d 965, 968 (4th Cir. 1992) (same); Sanchez–Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 207 (D.C. Cir. 1985) ("The Alien Tort Statute itself is not a waiver of sovereign immunity."). These courts have held that "any party asserting jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Statute must establish, independent of that statute, that the United States has consented to suit." Tobar, 639 F.3d at 1196 (quoting Goldstar, 967 F.2d at 968.).

We agree with this interpretation of the ATS. "The basic rule of federal sovereign immunity is that the United States cannot be sued at all without the consent of Congress." Freeman v. United States, 556 F.3d 326, 334–35 (5th Cir. 2009) (quoting Block v. N.D. ex rel. Bd. of Univ. & Sch. Lands, 461 U.S. 273, 287 (1983)) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because sovereign immunity is jurisdictional in nature, "Congress's 'waiver of [it] must be unequivocally expressed in statutory text and will not be implied.' " Id. at 335 (alteration in original) (quoting Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 192 (1996)). Nothing in the ATS indicates that Congress intended to waive the United States' sovereign immunity. The ATS simply provides, in full, as follows: "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 1350. This language contains no explicit waiver of sovereign immunity and does nothing more than establish that district courts have original jurisdiction to consider a discrete set of cases.

The Appellants must establish, independent of the ATS, that the United States has consented to suit. They have failed to do so. Though they reference several treaties to support their claim, the Appellants have not referenced any language indicating that the United States has consented to suit under any of these treaties. Accordingly, the district court properly dismissed the claim brought under the ATS.

III. BIVENS ACTION AGAINST AGENT MESA

We turn now to the Bivens action against Agent Mesa, which requires an analysis of Agent Mesa's entitlement to qualified immunity. See, e.g., Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 609 (1999). The doctrine of qualified immunity, which operates the same under both § 1983 and Bivens, "protects public officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known." Brown v. Strain, 663 F.3d 245, 249 (5th Cir. 2011) (internal quotation marks omitted). In assessing qualified immunity, we determine "(1) whether the facts that the plaintiff has alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right; and (2) whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct." Ramirez v. Martinez, 716 F.3d 369, 375 (5th Cir. 2013) (quoting Brown, 663 F.3d at 249) (internal quotation marks omitted). "A right is clearly established when 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' " Id. (quoting Jones v. Lowndes Cnty., 678 F.3d 344, 351 (5th Cir. 2012)).

Agent Mesa attacks the Appellants' claims on both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. His first argument, that there was no constitutional violation, is relatively straightforward: (1) any constitutional injury would have occurred in Mexico; (2) the Constitution does not guarantee rights to foreign nationals injured outside the sovereign territory of the United States; (3) therefore the Appellants cannot state a constitutional violation. This uncomplicated presentation of the Constitution's extraterritorial application, however, no longer represents the Supreme Court's view.

In Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), the Supreme Court provided its clearest articulation of the standards governing the application of constitutional principles abroad. The Court addressed whether aliens designated as enemy combatants and detained at Guantanamo Bay had the constitutional privilege of habeas corpus. 553 U.S. at 732.

In addressing this question, the Court first discussed its sparse precedent on the Constitution's geographic scope and found it to undermine "the Government's argument that, at least as applied to noncitizens, the Constitution necessarily stops where de jure sovereignty ends." Id. at 755. For example, the Insular Cases[7] addressed "whether the Constitution, by its own force, applies in any territory that is not a State." Id. at 756. In those cases, the Court held that the Constitution has independent force in newly acquired territories but recognized the inherent difficulties of imposing a new legal system onto these societies. Id. at 757. "These considerations resulted in the doctrine of territorial incorporation, under which the Constitution applies in full in incorporated Territories surely destined for statehood but only in part in unincorporated Territories." Id. This doctrine illustrated that "the Court took for granted that even in unincorporated Territories the Government of the United States was bound to provide to noncitizen inhabitants 'guaranties of certain fundamental personal rights declared in the Constitution,' " while still recognizing the "inherent practical difficulties of enforcing all constitutional provisions 'always and everywhere.' " Id. at 758–59 (quoting Balzac, 258 U.S. at 312).

Similar practical considerations were apparent in Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957). Id. at 759. There, the Boumediene Court explained, six Justices held that civilian spouses of U.S. servicemen stationed abroad could not be tried before military courts for murder and were instead entitled to a trial by jury. See id. at 760–61. The key disagreement between the plurality of four and the two concurring justices was over the continued precedential value of In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891), in which the Court had held "that under some circumstances Americans abroad have no right to indictment and trial by jury." Id. at 760. The four-Justice plurality sought to overrule Ross as "insufficiently protective of the rights of American citizens," whereas the two concurring Justices sought simply to distinguish it based on "practical considerations that made jury trial a more feasible option for [the civilian spouses] than it was for the petitioner in Ross." Id. at 761. The Boumediene Court noted that if practical considerations were irrelevant and citizenship had been the only relevant factor in Reid, "it would have been necessary for the Court to overturn Ross," something the two concurring justices were unwilling to do. Id. at 761–62.

Practical considerations "weighed heavily as well in Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950), where the Court addressed whether habeas corpus jurisdiction extended to enemy aliens who had been convicted of violating the laws of war." Id. at 762. There, the prisoners were detained in Germany, and the Eisentrager Court "stressed the difficulties of ordering the Government to produce the prisoners in a habeas corpus proceeding," explaining that it " 'would require allocation of shipping space, guarding personnel, billeting and rations' and would damage the prestige of military commanders at a sensitive time." Id. at 762 (quoting Eisentrager, 339 U.S. at 779). Though the prisoners were denied access to the writ, the Boumediene Court did not view the decision as having adopted "a formalistic, sovereignty-based test for determining the reach of the Suspension Clause." Id. Instead, the Court noted that practical considerations were integral to Eisentrager and stated that "[n]othing in Eisentrager says that de jure sovereignty is or has ever been the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution or of habeas corpus." Id. at 764.

The Court ultimately determined that all of these cases shared a common thread: "the idea that questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." Id. at 764. Based on these considerations, the Court concluded that at least three factors were relevant in determining the reach of the Suspension Clause:

> (1) the citizenship and status of the detainee and the adequacy of the process through which that status determination was made; (2) the nature of the sites where apprehension and then detention took place; and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner's entitlement to the writ.

Id. at 766. After analyzing these factors and finding "few practical barriers to the running of the writ," the Court held that the Suspension Clause "has full effect at Guantanamo Bay." Id. at 770–71.

Thus, Boumediene precludes the categorical test Agent Mesa suggests. Whatever else we may derive from the decision, one principle is clear: de jure sovereignty is not "the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution." Id. at 764. Instead, Boumediene and the cases cited therein indicate that our inquiry involves the selective application of constitutional limitations abroad, requiring us to balance the potential of such application against countervailing government interests.[8] In other words, our inquiry is not whether a constitutional principle can be applied abroad; it is whether it should. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 75 (1957) (Harlan, J., concurring)

[8] See Gerald L. Neuman, Strangers to the Constitution 8 (1996) (associating this approach with the concurring Justices in Reid v. Covert and suggesting that it "boil[s] down to a single right: the right to 'global due process' ").

("But, for me, the question is which guarantees of the Constitution should apply in view of the particular circumstances, the practical necessities, and the possible alternative which Congress had before it. The question is one of judgment, not of compulsion." (emphasis added)).

The district court concluded that Boumediene had no bearing on this case because it did not specifically address "the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures." We disagree. Though Boumediene's underlying facts concerned the Suspension Clause, its reasoning was not so narrow. The Court surveyed extraterritoriality cases involving myriad constitutional rights and spoke to the extraterritorial application of the Constitution, not simply the Suspension Clause. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 764 ("Nothing in Eisentrager says that de jure sovereignty is or has ever been the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution or of habeas corpus." (emphasis added)); id. ("[Q]uestions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism."). Our extraterritoriality analysis must therefore track Boumediene's.

Specifically, three "objective factors and practical concerns" are relevant to our extraterritoriality determination: (1) the citizenship and status of the claimant, (2) the nature of the location where the constitutional violation occurred, and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in enforcing the claimed right. Cf. id. at 766–71. The relevant practical obstacles include the consequences for U.S. actions abroad, the substantive rules that would govern the claim, and the likelihood that a favorable ruling would lead to friction with another country's government. See id.; Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 273–74; id. at 278 (Kennedy, J., concurring). These factors are not exhaustive, as the relevant considerations may change with the facts of an individual case, but they do provide a baseline for addressing questions of extraterritoriality.

The above factors do not obviate our reliance on the text of the Constitution itself. Not all constitutional provisions will have equal extraterritorial application, if any. Some contain geographical references, but others do not. Compare U.S. Const. amend. XIII ("Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude [ ] ... shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."), with U.S. Const. amend. V ("No person shall be ... deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law...."). In Boumediene, the "importance of the habeas right itself was an unlisted factor that ... argued in favor of broader reach." Neuman, The Extraterritorial Constitution, supra, at 287. Accordingly, as with any case of constitutional interpretation, extraterritoriality determinations require an analysis of the operation, text, and history of the specific constitutional provision involved.

With these principles in mind, we analyze whether the Constitution may be held to apply to the Appellants' claims, beginning with those asserted under the Fourth Amendment.

IV. FOURTH AMENDMENT

The Fourth Amendment provides, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated." U.S. Const. amend. IV. In United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), the Supreme Court, in a 5–4 decision, addressed the question of the Fourth Amendment's extraterritorial reach. There, the DEA cooperated with Mexican police officers to apprehend Verdugo–Urquidez, a citizen and resident of Mexico. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 262. Mexican officials then authorized the DEA to search Verdugo–Urquidez's Mexican residences, and DEA agents seized a tally sheet believed to reflect the quantities of marijuana Verdugo–Urquidez had smuggled into the United States. Id. at 262–63. The district court granted Verdugo–Urquidez's motion to suppress this evidence, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed, concluding that the Fourth Amendment applied extraterritorially to the searches and that the DEA agents had failed to justify their warrantless search of the premises. Id. at 263.

On appeal, the Supreme Court began its review of the Ninth Circuit's decision by focusing on the text of the Fourth Amendment. The Court noted that the Fourth Amendment "extends its reach only to 'the people,' " which "seems to have been a term of art employed in select parts of the Constitution," including the Preamble, Article I, and the First, Second, Fourth, Ninth, and Tenth Amendments. Id. at 265. Although not conclusive, the Court found this "textual exegesis" to suggest that "the people" in the Constitution "refers to a class of persons who are part of the national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this country to be considered part of that community." Id. The Court then examined the history of the drafting of the Fourth Amendment and concluded that "[t]he available historical data shows ... that the purpose of the Fourth Amendment was to protect the people of the United States against arbitrary action by their own Government; it was never suggested that the provision was intended to restrain the actions of the Federal Government against aliens outside of the United States territory." Id. at 266.

The Court next determined that the Ninth Circuit's global view was contrary to the Court's precedent, citing the same cases on which it would later rely in Boumediene. See id. at 268–70. The Court distinguished the cases Verdugo–Urquidez relied on, noting that those cases "establish[ed] only that aliens receive constitutional protections when they have come within the territory of the United States and developed substantial connections with this country." Id. at 271. Verdugo–Urquidez, by contrast, had no "significant voluntary connection" to the United States. Id.

Finally, the Court addressed the practical problems with the Ninth Circuit's ruling. The Court noted that the Ninth Circuit's global rule "would apply not only to law enforcement operations abroad, but also to other foreign policy operations which might result in 'searches or seizures.' " Id. at 273. Because the United States "frequently employs Armed Forces outside of this country," the application of the Fourth Amendment "to those circumstances could significantly disrupt the ability of the political branches to respond to the foreign situation involving our national interest." Id. at 273–74. Additionally, the Court cautioned that the Ninth Circuit's rule would plunge government officials "into a sea of uncertainty as to what might be reasonable in the way of searches and seizures conducted abroad." Id. at 274.

Based on all of the above considerations, the Court rejected the application of the Fourth Amendment to Verdugo–Urquidez's case:

> We think that the text of the Fourth Amendment, its history, and our cases discussing the application of the Constitution to aliens and extraterritorially require rejection of respondent's claim. At the time of the search, he was a citizen and resident of Mexico with no voluntary attachment to > the United States, and the place searched was located in Mexico. Under these circumstances, the Fourth Amendment has no application.

Id. at 274–75.

Justice Kennedy, one of the five Justices to join the opinion, agreed that no Fourth Amendment violation had occurred but wrote separately to explain his views, even though he did not believe them to "depart in fundamental respects from the opinion of the Court." Id. at 275 (Kennedy, J., concurring). Specifically, Justice Kennedy believed that "[t]he force of the Constitution is not confined because it was brought into being by certain persons who gave their immediate assent to its terms." Id. at 276. As a result, he could not "place any weight on the reference to 'the people' in the Fourth Amendment as a source of restricting its protections." Id. Instead, Justice Kennedy concluded that the "restrictions that the United States must observe with reference to aliens beyond its territory or jurisdiction depend[ ] ... on general principles of interpretation, not on an inquiry as to who formed the Constitution or a construction that some rights are mentioned as being those of 'the people.' " Id.

For Justice Kennedy, the lesson from the Court's prior cases was "not that the Constitution 'does not apply' overseas, but that there are provisions in the Constitution which do not necessarily apply in all circumstances in every foreign place." Id. at 277 (quoting Reid, 354 U.S. at 74 (Harlan, J., concurring)). "In other words, ... there is no rigid and abstract rule that Congress, as a condition precedent to exercising power over Americans overseas, must exercise it subject to all the guarantees of the Constitution, no matter what the conditions and considerations are that would make adherence to a specific guarantee altogether impracticable and anomalous." Id. at 277–78 (citation omitted). Based on this reasoning, Justice Kennedy agreed with the Court's outcome because "[t]he conditions and considerations of this case would make adherence to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement impracticable and anomalous." Id. at 278. He noted that the "absence of local judges or magistrates available to issue warrants, the differing and perhaps unascertainable conceptions of reasonableness and privacy that prevail abroad, and the need to cooperate with foreign officials all indicate that the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement should not apply in Mexico as it does in this country." Id. Thus, "[f]or this reason, in addition to the other persuasive justifications stated by the Court," Justice Kennedy agreed that no violation of the Fourth Amendment had occurred. Id.

The district court here relied on Verdugo–Urquidez to hold that Hernandez could not invoke the Fourth Amendment's protection because he was an alien without sufficient, voluntary connections to the United States. The Appellants rely on Justice Kennedy's concurrence to challenge this ruling. Because Justice Kennedy did not "place any weight on the reference to 'the people' in the Fourth Amendment," the Appellants argue that only a plurality of the Court agreed that aliens must have sufficient connections to the United States to be able to invoke the Fourth Amendment's protection. Rather than apply this nonbinding "sufficient connections" test, the Appellants urge us to rely on the "practical and functional" test articulated in Justice Kennedy's concurrence, which they believe was confirmed as the appropriate test in Boumediene.

Despite the Appellants' arguments to the contrary, we cannot ignore a decision from the Supreme Court unless directed to do so by the Court itself. See Ballew v. Cont'l Airlines, 668 F.3d 777, 782 (5th Cir. 2012). While the Boumediene Court appears to repudiate the formalistic reasoning of Verdugo–Urquidez's sufficient connections test, courts have continued to rely on the sufficient connections test and its related interpretation of the Fourth Amendment text. Other circuits have relied on Verdugo–Urquidez's interpretation to limit the Fourth Amendment's extraterritorial effect. See, e.g., Ibrahim v. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 669 F.3d 983, 997 (9th Cir. 2012) (applying the sufficient connections test in conjunction with Boumediene's functional approach); United States v. Emmanuel, 565 F.3d 1324, 1331 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Aliens do enjoy certain constitutional rights, but not the protection of the Fourth Amendment if they have 'no previous significant voluntary connection with the United States....' " (alteration in original) (quoting Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 271)). In addition, just two weeks after the Court issued Boumediene, which Appellants argue essentially overrules Verdugo–Urquidez, the Court decided District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008), and favorably cited Verdugo–Urquidez's definition of "the people." The Heller Court explained that "the people" referred "to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this country to be considered part of that community." Id. at 580 (citing Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 265). Indeed, our own court has relied on Verdugo–Urquidez's definition of "the people" in the context of the Second Amendment. See United States v. Portillo–Munoz, 643 F.3d 437, 440 (5th Cir. 2011). These examples undercut the Appellants' attempt to discredit Verdugo–Urquidez.

We also reject the Appellants' argument that Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion in Verdugo–Urquidez represented only a plurality view on the sufficient connections requirement. Justice Kennedy expressed no disagreement with the majority's justifications, instead describing them as "persuasive," 494 U.S. at 278 (Kennedy, J., concurring), and finding that his views did not "depart in fundamental respects" from those of the majority, id. at 275. This is unsurprising considering that Justice Kennedy joined the opinion of the Court. Id. We reject the Appellants' invitation to parse those writings in search of conflicts to nullify the Court's holding.

In sum, we are bound to apply the sufficient connections requirement of Verdugo–Urquidez, and we must do so in light of Boumediene's general functional approach. Reconciling these approaches is not an impossible task, though, because the Verdugo–Urquidez Court relied on more than just the text of the Fourth Amendment to reach its holding. See Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 265 (recognizing that its "textual exegesis [was] by no means conclusive"). It relied on the history of the Amendment, id. at 266, prior precedent, id. at 268–73, and practical consequences, id. at 273–75—all factors that we must consider after Boumediene.

Under this approach, we conclude that Hernandez lacked sufficient voluntary connections with the United States to invoke the Fourth Amendment. Though Hernandez's lack of territorial presence does not place a categorical bar on the Appellants' Fourth Amendment claims, the Appellants nevertheless do not show that Hernandez formed sufficient connections with the United States. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 762–764 (rejecting formalistic, sovereignty-based test for determining extraterritorial reach); see also Ibrahim, 669 F.3d at 997 (noting that activities abroad can contribute to forming sufficient connections to United States). Hernandez was a citizen of Mexico, not the United States. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766 (weighing citizenship and status of detainee in determining the reach of the Suspension Clause); Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 273 (citing cases that accord different protections to aliens than to citizens). This fact alone is not dispositive, see Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766; based on the facts alleged, Hernandez lacked a sustained connection with the United States sufficient to invoke protection. Appellants only allege that Hernandez played a game that involved touching the border fence and "had no interest in entering the United States." See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766 (noting that detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been held "for the duration of a conflict that ... is already among the longest wars in American history"); Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 272 (noting that Verdugo–Urquidez was in the United States "for only a matter of days"); see also Ibrahim, 669 F.3d at 997 (holding that Ibrahim established a sufficient connection as a result of her four years studying in the United States). Appellants do not suggest that Hernandez "accepted some societal obligations," including even the obligation to comply with our immigration laws, that might have entitled him to constitutional protection. See Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 273; Martinez–Aguero v. Gonzalez, 459 F.3d 618, 625 (5th Cir. 2006) (holding that alien's "regular and lawful entry of the United States pursuant to a valid border-crossing card and ... acquiescence in the U.S. system of immigration constitute[d] voluntary acceptance of societal obligations, rising to the level of 'substantial connections' "). Therefore, Hernandez's voluntary connections with the United States were insufficient to invoke the Fourth Amendment.

Finally, our reluctance to extend the Fourth Amendment on these facts reflects a number of practical considerations. "The 2,000–mile–long border between Mexico and the United States is the busiest in the world, with over 350 million crossings per year." Br. of Gov't of the United Mexican States as Amicus Curiae in Support of Appellants, 2. We have long recognized this area is unique for Fourth Amendment purposes. For instance, we allow broader search powers at our international borders and their functional equivalents because "national self protection reasonably requir[es] one entering the country to identify himself as entitled to come in, and his belongings as effects which may be lawfully brought in." Almeida–Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272 (1973) (quoting Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 154 (1925)) (internal quotation marks omitted). In the past decade, "the number of Border Patrol agents has doubled from approximately 10,000 to more than 21,000 agents," with most of these agents working along the Southwest border. Border Security, Economic Opportunity, and Immigration Modernization Act: Hearing on S. 744 Before the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 113th Cong. 6 (2013). The Department of Homeland Security now uses advanced technologies to monitor our borders, "including mobile surveillance units, thermal imaging systems, and large- and small-scale non-intrusive inspection equipment," as well as "124 aircraft and six Unmanned Aircraft Systems operating along the Southwest border." Id. at 6–7. These sophisticated systems of surveillance might carry with them a host of implications for the Fourth Amendment, cf. Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 40 (2001) (holding that when the government "uses a device that is not in general public use, to explore details of the home that would previously have been unknowable without physical intrusion, the surveillance is a 'search' and is presumptively unreasonable without a warrant"), and they do not look strictly inward. We cannot know all of the circumstances in which these tools will be used to effect a search or seizure outside our borders. But we do know that, as in Verdugo–Urquidez, "[a]pplication of the Fourth Amendment to [these] circumstances could significantly disrupt the ability of the political branches to respond to foreign situations involving our national interest" and could also plunge Border Patrol agents "into a sea of uncertainty as to what might be reasonable in the way of searches and seizures conducted abroad." 494 U.S. at 273–74.

Thus, under the Supreme Court's directives and considering the national interests at stake along our borders, we hold that, under the circumstances presented here—an alleged seizure occurring outside our border and involving a foreign national—the Fourth Amendment does not apply.

V. FIFTH AMENDMENT

We turn now to the Appellants' Fifth Amendment claim. The Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment provides, "No person shall be ... deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." U.S. Const. amend. V. This constitutional protection contains both a substantive and a procedural component. The substantive component "prevents the government from engaging in conduct that 'shocks the conscience' or interferes with rights 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' " whereas the procedural component ensures that any government action surviving substantive due process scrutiny is "implemented in a fair manner." United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987) (citations omitted).

The Appellants' claim implicates the substantive component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Specifically, the Appellants allege that Agent Mesa showed callous disregard for Hernandez's Fifth Amendment rights by using excessive, deadly force when Hernandez was unarmed and presented no threat. This type of claim is unusual because excessive-force claims are typically analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. Indeed, when the Fourth Amendment applies, excessive-force claims must be analyzed under that amendment. Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. at 395. But when a claim is not covered by the Fourth Amendment, we have recognized that an excessive-force claim may be asserted as a violation of due process. See, e.g., Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 900 (5th Cir. 1998) (concluding that the plaintiffs had "asserted a valid claim under § 1983 for a constitutional violation for excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment"). The question now is whether this constitutional protection can be applied extraterritorially.

A. Extraterritorial Application

The Appellants' Fifth Amendment claim is not constrained by prior precedent on extraterritoriality, unlike their claim under the Fourth Amendment. First, the Fifth Amendment's text does not limit the category of individuals entitled to protection. See, e.g., Lynch v. Cannatella, 810 F.2d 1363, 1374–75 (5th Cir. 1987). Whereas the Fourth Amendment applies only to "the people," a term of art, the Fifth Amendment applies by its express terms to "any person." Id. Therefore, our court has concluded that "[e]xcludable aliens are not non-persons." Id. This significantly different language leads us to the conclusion that Verdugo–Urquidez's sufficient connections test, which provides a gloss for the term "the people," does not apply in interpreting the extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment. Additionally, the Supreme Court has recognized some Fifth Amendment protections apply extraterritorially. See, e.g., Reid, 354 U.S. at 18–19 (plurality opinion); id. at 49 (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (concluding that, at least as to capital cases overseas, "the exercise of court-martial jurisdiction over civilian dependents in time of peace cannot be justified by Article I, considered in connection with the specific protections of Article III and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments"). Thus, whether the Fifth Amendment applies here depends on the objective factors and practical concerns we recognized above. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 766.

The first relevant factor is the citizenship and status of the claimant. Inside U.S. territory, a claimant's citizenship will ordinarily have no impact on whether the claimant is entitled to constitutional protection. But "[i]n cases involving the extraterritorial application of the Constitution, [the Court has] taken care to state whether the person claiming its protection is a citizen or an alien." Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 275 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (citations omitted). "The distinction between citizens and aliens follows from the undoubted proposition that the Constitution does not create, nor do general principles of law create, any juridical relation between our country and some undefined, limitless class of noncitizens who are beyond our territory." Id. Boumediene teaches that a claimant's citizenship is not dispositive, as it provided an example of a limited "class of noncitizens" entitled to constitutional protection, i.e., those detained at Guantanamo Bay. But the focus on citizenship is still important given the significance of applying constitutional protections abroad at all, let alone to noncitizens. Here, it is undisputed that Hernandez was a Mexican citizen with no connection to the United States. Yet, unlike the "enemy aliens" detained during the Allied Powers' post-World War II occupation in Eisentrager, 339 U.S. at 765–66, or the "enemy combatants" held pursuant to the Authorization for Use of Military Force in Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 734, 767, Hernandez was a civilian killed outside an occupied zone or theater of war. Thus, while Hernandez's citizenship weighs against extraterritorial application, his status does not.

The second factor requires us to look at the "nature of the sites" where the alleged violation occurred. In Boumediene, the Court examined the level of control the United States exerted over the site where the individual's apprehension and detention occurred. The Court concluded that, although Guantanamo Bay was "technically outside the sovereign territory of the United States," the United States "has maintained complete and uninterrupted control of the bay for over 100 years." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 764, 768. The court looked to the "political history" of Guantanamo and took into consideration the lease agreement permitting the United States to maintain control over Guantanamo. Id. at 764–65. By contrast, the Court reasoned that the United States control over Landsberg Prison in occupied Germany in the Eisentrager case was transient and that the United States was accountable to its "Allies for all activities occurring there." Id. at 768.

We therefore reject Agent Mesa's argument that Eisentrager—which held that enemy aliens beyond the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States could not invoke the protections of the Fifth Amendment—compels a result in his favor. As mentioned above, Boumediene rejected such a formalistic reading of Eisentrager. Although de jure sovereignty "is a factor that bears upon which constitutional guarantees apply," nothing "in Eisentrager says that de jure sovereignty is or has ever been the only relevant consideration in determining the geographic reach of the Constitution." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 764.

Based on the nature of the border area where the shooting occurred, we cannot say that the United States exercises no control. Unlike both Guantanamo and Landsberg Prison, this is not a case requiring constitutional application in a far-away location. Agent Mesa was standing inside the United States, an area very much within U.S. control, when he committed the act. Border Patrol agents exercise their official duties within feet of where the alleged constitutional violation occurred. In fact, agents act on or occasionally even across the border they protect. Amici for Appellants inform us that Border Patrol agents have reportedly fatally shot and killed individuals across the border in several incidents. See Br. of Amici Curiae Border Network for Human Rights, et al., in Support of Appellants, 8–12.[9] Therefore, in a very blunt sense, Border Patrol agents exercise hard power across the border at least as far as their U.S.-based use of force injures individuals.

Boumediene further instructs us to look at the political history of a location to understand how the United States might exercise control. Here, the control exercised in cross-border shootings reflects broader U.S. customs and border protection policies that expand U.S. control beyond the nation's territorial borders. The Chief of the U.S. Border Patrol explains that U.S. border security policy "extends [the nation's] zone of security outward, ensuring that our physical border is not the first or last line of defense, but one of many." Securing Our Borders—Operational Control and the Path Forward: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Border and Maritime Security of the H. Comm. on Homeland Security, 112th Cong. 8 (2011) (prepared statement of Michael J. Fisher, Chief of U.S. Border Patrol). For example, Bureau of Customs and Border Protection officials are authorized to conduct "preinspection" examination and inspection of passengers for final determination of admissibility and crew "at the port or place in foreign territory." 8 C.F.R. § 235.5(b); see also Ayelet Shachar, The Shifting Border of Immigration Regulation, 3 Stan. J. C.R. & C.L. 165, 174–77 (2007). Moreover, this recent articulation of extraterritorial policy appears to be only the latest manifestation in a long history of United States involvement beyond the U.S.-Mexico border. See Eva Bitran, Note, Boumediene at the Border? The Constitution and Foreign Nationals on the U.S.-Mexico Border, 49 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L.Rev. 229, 244–47 (2014) (collecting historical examples showing that United States "exerts and has exerted powerful influence over northern Mexico").

The Border Patrol's exercise of control through its use of force at and across the border more closely resembles the control the United States exercised in Guantanamo than it does the control over Landsberg Prison in Eisentrager. First, U.S. power at the border is not transient. Boumediene distinguished Eisentrager because the control the United States exercised in Landsberg Prison in Eisentrager was transient. But here, Border Patrol agents are not representatives of a temporary occupational force. They are influential repeat players in a "constant" border relationship. See Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 768–69. Second, U.S. officers at the border are not "answerable to" U.S. border partners in the way Landsberg jailers were to Allied authorities. Id. at 768. In fact, the Mexican government requests that U.S. government actors are held accountable in U.S. courts for actions on Mexican territory. Br. of Gov't of the United Mexican States as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants, 16. Therefore, this situation is different from the Allied occupation of Germany, where authorities shared accountability.

In sum, even though the United States has no formal control or de facto sovereignty over the Mexican side of the border, the heavy presence and regular activity of federal agents across a permanent border without any shared accountability weigh in favor of recognizing some constitutional reach.

Finally, we address the practical obstacles and other functional considerations extraterritorial application would present. We recognized some of the practical concerns already: the national interest in self-protection; the constant need for surveillance, often with advanced technologies; and concerns over varying degrees of reasonableness depending on an agent's location at any given time. While these practical concerns counsel against the Fourth Amendment's application, they do not carry the same weight in the Fifth Amendment context because different standards govern the respective claims.

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures, while, in this context, the Fifth Amendment protects against arbitrary conduct that shocks the conscience. The level of egregiousness required to satisfy the latter standard militates against protecting conduct that reaches it. We abstained from placing Fourth Amendment limits on actions across the border in part to allow officials to preserve our national interest in self-protection. A reasonableness limitation would have injected uncertainty into the government's decision-making process, perhaps resulting in adverse consequences for U.S. actions abroad. That interest, however, plays no role in determining whether an alien is entitled to protection against arbitrary, conscience-shocking conduct across the border. This principle protecting individuals from arbitrary conduct is consistent with those our government has recognized internationally,[10] and applying it here would hardly cause friction with the host government. The Mexican government submitted a brief seeking to "allay any concerns that ... a ruling in the plaintiffs' favor would interfere with Mexico's sovereignty or otherwise create practical difficulties." Br. of Gov't of the United Mexican States as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants 3.

Because Agent Mesa was inside our territory when he allegedly acted unconstitutionally, the United States, like in Boumediene, "is, for all practical purposes, answerable to no other sovereign for its acts." 553 U.S. at 770. If the Constitution does not apply here, the only check on unlawful conduct would be that which the [10] See, e.g., International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights art. 6(1), Mar. 23, 1976, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 ("Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life.").

Executive Branch provides. Cf. Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 765 (noting a concern that "the political branches have the power to switch the Constitution on or off at will" and would represent "a striking anomaly in our tripartite system of government"). Indeed, a strict, territorial approach would allow agents to move in and out of constitutional strictures, creating zones of lawlessness. That approach would establish a perverse rule that would treat differently two individuals subject to the same conduct merely because one managed to cross into our territory.

Significantly, recognizing extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment for conscience-shocking conduct would not force agents to change their conduct to conform to a newly articulated standard. We have already recognized that aliens inside our borders, even those found to be excludable, are entitled "to be free of gross physical abuse at the hands of state or federal officials." Lynch, 810 F.2d at 1374; see also Martinez-Aguero, 459 F.3d at 626 ("Lynch plainly confers on aliens in disputes with border agents a right to be free from excessive force, and no reasonable officer would believe it proper to beat a defenseless alien without provocation, as Martinez-Aguero alleges."). To extend that right to those injured across the border by U.S. officers located in the United States would have the unremarkable effect of informing federal officials that they are also prohibited from arbitrarily inflicting harm in this new, but similar, context.

We will enforce the applicable constitutional principle, unless textual, precedential, or practical barriers bar judicial redress of constitutional violations—that is, when enforcing it is not "impracticable and anomalous." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 759 (quoting Reid, 354 U.S. at 74 (Harlan, J., concurring)). Here it is not. We therefore hold that a noncitizen injured outside the United States as a result of arbitrary official conduct by a law enforcement officer located in the United States may invoke the protections provided by the Fifth Amendment.

B. Bivens Action

Next, we must address whether Appellants have a cause of action against Agent Mesa for the violations they allege. "Under Bivens a person may sue a federal agent for money damages when the federal agent has allegedly violated that person's constitutional rights." Martinez–Aguero, 459 F.3d at 622 n. 1. Yet Bivens is "not an automatic entitlement." Wilkie v. Robbins, 551 U.S. 537, 550 (2007). The Supreme Court has "consistently refused to extend Bivens liability to any new context or new category of defendants." Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 68 (2001).

1. New Context

As a preliminary matter, then, we must decide whether this case presents a "new context" in which Bivens might apply. The district court concluded that this case did not present an extension of Bivens, because the Supreme Court had previously recognized a Bivens action for a claim under the Fifth Amendment. See Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228, 248–49 (1979) (extending Bivens action for employee's Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause unconstitutional gender discrimination action against congressional employer). But the district court's conclusion overlooks the context-specific approach the Supreme Court has adopted in deciding whether to extend a Bivens action. See Malesko, 534 U.S. at 68. After all, the Supreme Court has since rejected implying a Bivens action in a different Fifth Amendment Due Process case. See Wilkie, 551 U.S. at 562. (declining to recognize a Bivens action under the Fifth Amendment for a landowner against federal land management agents accused of harassment). Instead of an amendment-by-amendment ratification of Bivens actions, we are bound to examine each new context—that is, each new "potentially recurring scenario that has similar legal and factual components." Arar v. Ashcroft, 585 F.3d 559, 572 (2d Cir.2009) (en banc). In defining that context, we describe a scenario neither too general, nor too specific. Id.

This case appears to present a new context, though the category of federal defendants is not new. In Bivens itself, the Supreme Court recognized a Fourth Amendment claim for unreasonable search and seizure against federal law enforcement agents. 403 U.S. 388, 397. In addition, our Court has permitted a non-citizen to bring a Bivens action against Border Patrol agents for false arrest and excessive use of force under the Fourth Amendment for events occurring at the border. Martinez–Aguero, 459 F.3d at 625. Finally, our Court implicitly recognized noncitizens' rights against federal officials for Fifth Amendment gross physical abuse claims, but did not explicitly discuss whether the extension of Bivens in that case was appropriate. Lynch, 810 F.2d 1363, 1374. Because Lynch "gave the matter only cursory attention," we still need to conduct "a more complete analysis of the question." See Engel v. Buchan, 710 F.3d 698, 703 (7th Cir. 2013) (conducting Bivens analysis even though a prior court had implicitly extended Bivens in the same context). In sum, faced with a new situation, we must analyze whether an individual should have a Bivens remedy arising under the Fifth Amendment against a federal law enforcement agent for his conscience-shocking use of excessive force across our nation's borders.

2. Extending Bivens Action

Having determined that this case raises a new context, we must decide whether to extend a Bivens remedy. We first ask "whether any alternative, existing process for protecting the constitutionally recognized interest amounts to a convincing reason for the Judicial Branch to refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages." Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S. Ct. 617, 621 (2012) (quoting Wilkie, 551 U.S. at 550) (alterations and internal quotation marks omitted). Then, we ask whether, in our own judgment, "special factors counsel[ ] hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress." Bivens, 403 U.S. at 396; see also Minneci, 132 S. Ct. at 621.

a. Alternative Remedies

There is no question that Appellants lack any alternative remedy for their Fifth Amendment right. An alternative, existing process merely has to "provide roughly similar incentives for potential defendants to comply with [the constitutional requirements] while also providing roughly similar compensation to victims of violations." Engel, 710 F.3d at 705 (alteration in original) (quoting Minneci, 132 S. Ct. at 625). According to the Mexican government, the Appellants cannot sue Agent Mesa in Mexican courts, because, as long as "Agent Mesa avoids travel to Mexico, any effective and enforceable remedy against him can only come from the U.S. courts." Br. of Gov't of the United Mexican States as Amicus Curiae for Appellants 16. The Appellants may not sue Agent Mesa under state law either, because plaintiffs "ordinarily cannot bring state-law tort actions against employees of the Federal Government." Minneci, 132 S. Ct. at 623 (citing 28 U.S.C. §§ 2671, 2679(b)(1) ("the Westfall Act") (substituting the United States as defendant in tort action against federal employee)); Osborn v. Haley, 549 U.S. 225, 238, 241 (2007). Besides, as discussed above, an individual in Hernandez's position will never be able to recover under the FTCA because of the application of the foreign-country exception. See supra Part II.A.[11]

Appellants also do not appear to lack an alternative remedy as a result of Congress's deliberate choice. Congress has not chosen to skip over a remedy within an "elaborate, comprehensive scheme" that otherwise would cover Appellants' alleged constitutional violation. See

---

[11] The Westfall Act also shows that Congress intended to make a Bivens remedy available in most circumstances. The Westfall Act of 1988 expanded officer immunity by making an FTCA claim against the United States an exclusive remedy, see 28 U.S.C. § 2679(b)(1), but Congress also implicitly ratified the availability of an action for damages against federal officers for constitutional violations—that is, a Bivens action—even where FTCA claims are available, see 28 U.S.C. § 2679(b)(2)(A) (the exclusiveness of a remedy under the FTCA "does not extend or apply to a civil action against an employee of the Government ... which is brought for a violation of the Constitution of the United States."). Courts have recognized that this provision expresses Congress's intent to preserve Bivens actions. See, e.g., Simpkins v. D.C. Gov't, 108 F.3d 366, 371–72 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (noting that § 2679(b)(2)(A) provides an "exception for Bivens actions against government employees"); Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 208 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Wood, J., concurring in the judgment), cert. denied, 133 S. Ct. 2796 (2013); see also James E. Pfander and David Baltmanis, Rethinking Bivens: Legitimacy and Constitutional Adjudication, 98 Geo. L.J. 117, 132–38 (2009) (arguing that Congress "joined the Court as a partner in recognizing remedies in the nature of a Bivens action [based on] the Westfall Act's preservation of suits for violation of the Constitution and [on] the considerations that led to its adoption."). As a result, Congress has indicated an intent to preserve the availability of Bivens actions at least in those instances where an alternative remedial scheme does not preclude it.

Bush v. Lucas, 462 U.S. 367, 385 (1983); see also Zuspann v. Brown, 60 F.3d 1156, 1161 (5th Cir. 1995) (holding that Congress created a comprehensive review of veterans' benefits disputes and explicitly precluded judicial review of veterans' benefits disputes, so that Congress's failure to create a remedy against individual Veterans Affairs employees was "not an oversight"). In particular, the elaborate system of remedies and procedures under the immigration system are not relevant to this case.

In Arar v. Ashcroft, the Second Circuit suggested but did not decide that Congress's "substantial, comprehensive, and intricate remedial scheme in the context of immigration" might preclude a Bivens remedy for a noncitizen who alleged that federal officials illegally detained him, ordered his removal to Syria, and encouraged and facilitated his interrogation under torture. 585 F.3d at 572. In Mirmehdi v. United States, the Ninth Circuit held that "Congress's failure to include monetary relief [under the Immigration and Nationality Act for constitutionally invalid detention] can hardly be said to be inadvertent" in light of the frequent attention Congress has given the statute. 689 F.3d 975, 982 (9th Cir. 2012) cert. denied, 133 S. Ct. 2336 (2013). But unlike those contexts—extraordinary rendition and wrongful detention pending removal proceedings, respectively—it is far from clear that Congress intended for the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide remedies (or purposefully omit them) for a situation like that in the case presented. Quite plainly, even though Agent Mesa is an immigration law enforcement officer, see 8 U.S.C. § 1357 (providing law enforcement powers of immigration officers); 8 C.F.R. § 287.5 (giving law enforcements power to border patrol agents), this is not an immigration case. After all, Agent Mesa's alleged conduct foreclosed any possibility that Hernandez would access the remedial system for removal that Congress designed. Even had Hernandez survived, he could not have been detained by a U.S. immigration official, because he was in Mexico. Congress has not made it clear through its regulation of immigration that it intends for persons injured by Border Patrol agents—be they citizens or not—to lack a damages remedy for unconstitutional uses of force.

Defendants Cordero and Manjarrez alternatively contend that federal law enforcement agencies provide some remedy by conducting criminal investigations of the incidents. They point to federal homicide statutes, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1111, 1112, and criminal civil rights statutes, id. § 242. Far from an adequate alternative, these procedures fail to redress the alleged harm to Appellants, and at most represent a mere "patchwork" of remedies insufficient to overcome Bivens. See Wilkie, 551 U.S. at 554. Thus, for those in the Hernandez family's shoes, it is a Bivens remedy or nothing. See Bivens, 403 U.S. at 410 (Harlan, J., concurring).

b. Special Factors Counseling Hesitation

We proceed to step two of the Bivens framework, which requires us to exercise our judgment in determining whether "any special factors counsel hesitation." We see none.

Bivens itself provided little guidance on what qualifies as a special factor. Bivens, 403 U.S. at 396. Since then the Supreme Court and our sister circuits have identified a handful of "special factors." See Arar, 585 F.3d at 573 (describing "special factors" as "an embracing category, not easily defined"). For example, one class of special factors focuses on Congress's express or implied "concerns about judicial intrusion into the sensitive work of specific classes of federal defendants."

Engel, 710 F.3d at 707. The Supreme Court has especially emphasized this rationale in military contexts. See United States v. Stanley, 483 U.S. 669, 683–84 (1987) (no Bivens action for injuries arising out of or in the course of activity incident to military service); Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296, 300 (1983) (holding that "necessarily unique structure of the military" is a special factor counseling against providing Bivens remedy). Other circuits have relied on that rationale to refuse to extend Bivens suits in a variety of cases arising from actions taken by our government in its War on Terror. See, e.g., Lebron v. Rumsfeld, 670 F.3d 540, 548 (4th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2751 (2012) (holding that constitutional separation of powers and lack of judicial competence counsel hesitation in implying Bivens action for enemy combatants held in military detention); accord Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 200 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc); Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 773 (D.C. Cir. 2011). One circuit has even extended that reasoning to immigration-related cases. Mirmehdi, 689 F.3d at 982. Another species of special factor is the workability of the cause of action. See Wilkie, 551 U.S. at 555 (doctrinal workability of cause of action).

This case does not implicate any of these special factors. Agent Mesa did not act in a military setting; nor did his actions implicate national security. Given the similarity of this case to the original Bivens remedy and the relative workability of the doctrine, we find no reason to hesitate in extending Bivens to this new context. The only argument that might cause us to decline to extend a Bivens remedy is the Ninth Circuit's identification of "immigration issues" writ large as necessarily creating a special factor counseling hesitation. Mirmehdi, 689 F.3d at 982. Yet, as our discussion of alternative remedies indicates, however, we think this case does not present an "immigration" context. Moreover, even if we did treat this case as involving an "immigration issue," we would not follow Mirmehdi's analysis.

In a case brought by aliens challenging their illegal detention prior to removal proceedings, the Ninth Circuit concluded that claims pertaining to immigration " 'have the natural tendency to affect diplomacy, foreign policy, and the security of the nation,' which further 'counsels hesitation' in extending Bivens." Id. (quoting Arar, 585 F.3d at 574). First, we decline to follow Mirmehdi, because the opinion unjustifiably extends the special factors identified in Arar well beyond that decision's specific national security "context of extraordinary rendition." Arar, 585 F.3d at 574. As the Second Circuit remarked with more than a dash of understatement, Arar "is not a typical immigration case." Id. at 570. In fact, the government's treatment of Arar was so anomalous that the court concluded it could not rely on the provisions of the governing immigration statute, the Immigration and Nationality Act, for any of its holding. See id. at 571, 573.

Second, even while we acknowledge Congress's significant interest in shaping matters of immigration policy, which "can affect trade, investment, tourism, and diplomatic relations for the entire Nation," Arizona v. United States, 132 S. Ct. 2492, 2498 (2012), that fact alone does not give us cause to hesitate, let alone halt, in granting a Bivens remedy. The Supreme Court has recently written to emphasize the strong national interest Congress has in protecting aliens from mistreatment.[12] See id. The Court noted that

[12] We note that Sergio's alienage does not amount to a special factor counseling hesitation. Our circuit has previously recognized that an alien may be entitled to a damages remedy against federal officers. See Martinez-Aguero, 459 F.3d at 621–22 & n. 1 (recognizing a Bivens remedy for an alien); see also Vance, 701 F.3d immigration policy concerns the "perceptions and expectations of aliens in this country who seek the full protection of its laws," acknowledged that the "mistreatment of aliens in the United States may lead to harmful reciprocal treatment of American citizens abroad," and reaffirmed that " '[o]ne of the most important and delicate of all international relationships ... has to do with the protection of the just rights of a country's own nationals when those nationals are in another country.' " Id. at 2498–99 (alteration in original) (quoting Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 64 (1941)).[13] This strong national commitment to aliens' rights not only militates in favor of a uniform, federal policy, as the Court concluded in Arizona v. United States; it also militates in favor of the availability of some federal remedy for mistreatment at the hands of those who

at 203 (rejecting alienage as special factor). The reason for this position is clear: to treat alienage as a special factor for not providing a damages remedy would be to double count our reasons for not providing a substantive right: having settled that Appellants are entitled to bring a claim for substantive due process under the Fifth Amendment even though Hernandez was an alien, we see no additional reason to hesitate in granting a remedy for that right. See Davis, 442 U.S. at 246 ("[A]lthough a suit against a Congressman for putatively unconstitutional actions taken in the course of his official conduct does raise special concerns counseling hesitation, we hold that these concerns are coextensive with the protections afforded by the Speech or Debate Clause."). The same goes for extraterritoriality. Having already concluded that the right applies extraterritorially, we think it is improper to treat the location of the injury as a factor counting against extension of the remedy.

[13] Although the Supreme Court was not called upon to decide whether these same interests also extend to aliens outside the United States who are under the control of U.S. officers within the United States, we think the principle would be no different. The same concern for the protection of the rights of aliens applies with equal force here.

enforce our immigration laws. Where those who allege mistreatment have a right but lack a remedy, as here, the Supreme Court suggests that Congress would want some remedy to be available.

Third, the case before us involves questions of precisely Bivens-like domestic law enforcement and nothing more. Mirmehdi implies that cases in the immigration context necessarily involve more than the "mere 'disclosure of normal domestic law-enforcement priorities and techniques,' " 689 F.3d at 983 (quoting Reno v. Am.-Arab Anti-Discrim. Comm., 525 U.S. 471, 490 (1999)). The Mirmehdi court asserts such cases "often involve 'the disclosure of foreign-policy objectives and ... foreign-intelligence products.' " Id. (quoting Reno, 525 U.S. at 490). But nothing in this case bears out that assertion. To accept that conclusion would require us to abandon our prior case law, in which we have permitted Bivens actions to proceed against immigration officers. See Martinez-Aguero, 459 F.3d at 621–25; Lynch, 810 F.2d at 1374. We find no reason for giving immigration officers special solicitude now.

In fact, this case presents a scenario not unlike that in Bivens. Just as the Seventh Circuit explained in extending a Bivens remedy for alleged Brady violations under the Due Process Clause, providing a remedy for a claim of gross physical abuse by a federal law enforcement officer presents "no great problem of judicial interference with the work of law enforcement, certainly no greater than the Fourth Amendment claim in Bivens." See Engel, 710 F.3d at 708; cf. Malesko, 534 U.S. at 75 (Scalia, J., concurring) (arguing that the Supreme Court should cease to extend Bivens actions beyond the "precise circumstances that [Bivens] involved"). In Bivens, the plaintiff brought his lawsuit against federal agents for their warrantless search of his apartment, but also for the unreasonable use of force in arresting him. See 403 U.S. 388, 389 ("[Bivens's]) complaint asserted that the arrest and search were effected without a warrant, and that unreasonable force was employed in making the arrest; fairly read, it alleges as well that the arrest was made without probable cause." Here, too, Appellants allege the use of unreasonable force by federal agents. The only difference is that—for the reasons stated above—the Appellants must avail themselves of the Fifth Amendment rather than the Fourth Amendment.

Moreover, "the legal standards for adjudicating the claim are well established and easily administrable." Engel, 710 F.3d at 708; see Wilkie, 551 U.S. at 555 ("defining a workable cause of action" may be a special factor). Relatedly, we foresee no "deluge" of potential claimants availing themselves of this particular Bivens action. See Davis, 442 U.S. at 248 (rejecting argument that implying Bivens action would cause a deluge of claims). The standards for extraterritorial application of the constitutional right and the substantive definition of that right are so stringent that the creation of a damages remedy will already limit the size of any potential class of claimants under this Bivens action.

Therefore, we extend a Bivens action in this specific context in which an individual located abroad asserts a right to be free from gross physical abuse under the Fifth Amendment against federal law enforcement agents located in the United States based on their conscience-shocking, excessive use of force across our nation's borders.[14]

[14] We do not rule on whether a Bivens action will be available beyond the scenario here. For example, we do not suggest that a Bivens action would be available where military personnel had allegedly violated the individual's right.

C. Qualified Immunity

Having concluded that the Fifth Amendment does apply in this particular extraterritorial context and that Bivens provides a remedy, we resume the familiar qualified immunity analysis, beginning with whether Appellants have alleged a constitutional right.

1. Constitutional right

We first address whether the Appellants have sufficiently alleged a Fifth Amendment violation. The district court determined that Graham v. Connor precluded the Appellants' Fifth Amendment claim because Agent Mesa's "apprehension by the use of deadly force" amounted to a seizure to be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. As mentioned above, although it is true that Graham requires most excessive force claims to be pursued under the Fourth Amendment rather than under the more general substantive due process standard of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, that rule is not absolute. Graham "does not hold that all constitutional claims relating to physically abusive government conduct must arise under either the Fourth or Eighth Amendments." United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 272 n. 7 (1997). Instead, "Graham simply requires that if a constitutional claim is covered by a specific constitutional provision, such as the Fourth or Eighth Amendment, the claim must be analyzed under the standard appropriate to that specific provision, not under the rubric of substantive due process." Id.; see also Petta, 143 F.3d at 900 (explaining that Graham rejected the substantive due process standard "only in cases in which the alleged excessive use of force arguably violated a specific right protected under the Bill of Rights"). "Substantive due process analysis is therefore inappropriate in this case only if [the Appellants'] claim is 'covered by' the Fourth Amendment." See Cnty. of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 843 (1998).

The inapplicability of the Fourth Amendment in this case establishes that the Appellants' claim is not "covered by" the Fourth Amendment. Thus, Graham does not preclude the Appellants from asserting their claim under the Fifth Amendment. Additionally, the facts alleged in the complaint, if proven, would be sufficient to establish a Fifth Amendment violation.

To state a valid claim for a violation of substantive due process, a plaintiff must establish that the officer's actions (1) caused an injury, (2) were grossly disproportionate to the need for action under the circumstances, and (3) were inspired by malice rather than merely careless or unwise excess of zeal so that it amounted to an abuse of official power that shocks the conscience. Petta, 143 F.3d at 902; cf. Lewis, 523 U.S. at 836 (holding that a state police officer did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process by causing a person's death in a high-speed automobile chase because "only a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of arrest will satisfy the element of arbitrary conduct shocking to the conscience, necessary for a due process violation"); Salerno, 481 U.S. at 746 (noting that the substantive due process component of the Fifth Amendment "prevents the government from engaging in conduct that shocks the conscience" (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)). "[O]nly the most egregious official conduct can be said to be 'arbitrary in the constitutional sense'...." Lewis, 523 U.S. at 846 (quoting Collins v. Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 129 (1992)).

But if ever a case could be said to present an official abuse of power so arbitrary as to shock the conscience, the Appellants have alleged it here. According to the Appellants' complaint, Hernandez had retreated behind the pillars of a bridge when, unprovoked, Agent Mesa fired two gunshots in his direction. One of the gunshots struck him in the face and killed him. On these facts, Agent Mesa had no reason to suspect that Hernandez had committed any crime or engaged in any conduct that would justify the use of any, let alone deadly, force. With no apparent justification for this action, a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that Agent Mesa "acted out of conscience-shocking malice or wantonness rather than merely careless or excessive zeal." Petta, 143 F.3d at 902–03. We therefore conclude that the Appellants have satisfied the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis by adequately alleging a constitutional violation.

D. Clearly Established Law

Finally, we must determine whether Hernandez's rights were "clearly established" at the time of the incident. According to Agent Mesa, they were not, because the uncertainty in the law surrounding the availability of constitutional rights abroad ensured that any right we might recognize could not have been clearly established at the time of the shooting. This argument, however, misconstrues qualified immunity doctrine. "Clearly established" in this context does not refer to whether Hernandez, specifically, had the clearly established right to invoke Fifth Amendment protection at the time of the incident. It refers instead to the "objective legal reasonableness" of Agent Mesa's action, "assessed in light of the legal rules that were 'clearly established' at the time it was taken." Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 639 (1987) (citing Harlow v.

Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818–19 (1982)). In other words, qualified immunity does not shield conduct that is known to be unlawful merely because it is unclear that such unlawful conduct can be challenged. That is, whether the right applied extraterritorially to Hernandez and thus whether Hernandez could assert the Fourth or Fifth Amendment right does not alter the standard for conduct under those rights. "Qualified immunity shields an officer from suit when she makes a decision that, even if constitutionally deficient, reasonably misapprehends" the law governing the "circumstances she confronted." Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 198 (2004) (per curiam). Thus, "[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted." Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001).

No reasonable officer would have understood Agent Mesa's alleged conduct to be lawful. The obvious wrongfulness of the alleged conduct but also our precedents concerning the rights of aliens confirm this conclusion. As mentioned above, we have already recognized that aliens inside our border are entitled "to be free of gross physical abuse at the hands of state or federal officials." Lynch, 810 F.2d at 1374; see also Martinez-Aguero, 459 F.3d at 626–27 ("Lynch plainly confers on aliens in disputes with border agents a right to be free from excessive force, and no reasonable officer would believe it proper to beat a defenseless alien without provocation, as Martinez–Aguero alleges.").

Agent Mesa argues that his alleged conduct was acceptable as long as its impact was felt outside our borders. This is not a reasonable misapprehension of the law entitled to immunity. It does not take a court ruling for an official to know that no concept of reasonableness could justify the unprovoked shooting of another person.

See Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 745 (2002) (noting that cases involving fundamentally similar facts "are not necessary" to finding a right clearly established and holding that "obvious cruelty inherent in [prison official's] practice should have provided respondents with notice that their alleged conduct violated Hope's constitutional protection."). Accordingly, we hold that the facts alleged by the Appellants defeat Agent Mesa's claim of qualified immunity.

VI. CLAIMS AGAINST THE SUPERVISORS

Finally, we address the constitutional claims against Agent Mesa's supervisors. "Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens ... suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 676 (2009). The Appellants allege that the supervisors promulgated policies they knew were inadequate regarding the use of deadly force and also failed to train officers regarding the appropriate use of their firearms. As the district court noted, however, neither of the remaining supervisors was shown to have any personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation. Specifically, the district court found that Agent Cordero "had not served as a line supervisor for agents in Agent Mesa's position since 2006"—four years before the incident—and that it had been at least eight months since Agent Manjarrez had supervised Agent Mesa. The Appellants do not challenge these findings and point to no specific policy nor any other evidence that would suggest that the supervisors were personally responsible for the alleged constitutional violation. Under these circumstances, the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the supervisors.

VII. CONCLUSION

Because the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for any of the claims asserted against it, we AFFIRM the judgment in favor of the United States. Similarly, we AFFIRM the judgment in favor of the supervisors because the Appellants have failed to establish that either supervisor was personally responsible for the alleged constitutional violations. But because we hold that the Appellants can assert a Fifth Amendment claim against Agent Mesa and that they have alleged sufficient facts to overcome qualified immunity, we REVERSE the judgment in favor of Agent Mesa and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JAMES L. DENNIS, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment:

I join the court's opinion in its entirety except for Part IV, with which I agree in part and in result. In United States v. Verdugo–Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), the Supreme Court apparently ruled that the phrase "the people" in the Fourth Amendment "refers to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with this community to be considered part of that community." Id. at 265. I am inclined to agree, however, with those who have suggested that the Verdugo–Urquidez view cannot be squared with the Court's later holding in Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), that "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors, and practical concerns, not formalism." Id. at 764; see WAYNE R.

LAFAVE ET AL., 2 CRIM. PROC. § 3.1(i) n. 237.1 (3d ed.2014) (citing Gerald L. Neuman, The Extraterritorial Constitution After Boumediene v. Bush, 82 S. CAL. L.REV. 259, 259, 272 (2008); Ellen S. Podgor, Welcome to the Other Side of the Railroad Tracks: A Meaningless Exclusionary Rule, 16 SW. J. INT'L L. 299, 310 (2010)); Baher Azmy, Executive Detention, Boumediene, and the New Common Law of Habeas, 95 IOWA L.REV. 445, 465 (2010); Christina Duffy Burnett, A Convenient Constitution? Extraterritoriality After Boumediene, 109 COLUM. L.REV. 973, 1044 (2009); Timothy Zick, Territoriality and the First Amendment: Free Speech at—and Beyond—Our Borders, 85 NOTRE DAME L.REV. 1543, 1614 (2010).

The Mexican government has indicated that our adjudication of the Appellants' claims, whether under the Fourth or Fifth Amendment, in this particular case would not cause any friction with its sovereign interests. However, it appears that our judicial entanglement with extraterritorial Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims would be far more likely to involve impracticable and anomalous factors than would a "shocks the conscience" Fifth Amendment claim. For these reasons, I agree with the opinion of the court in declining to apply the Fourth Amendment in adjudicating the Appellants' claims but I do so out of concern for pragmatic and political questions rather than on a formal classification of the litigants involved.

HAROLD R. DeMOSS, JR., Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

I join in Parts I, II, and VI of the court's opinion and I concur in the result of Part IV. For the reasons stated below, I dissent from Part V.

The majority recognizes that "it is undisputed that Hernandez was a Mexican citizen with no connection to the United States." Majority Op. at 268. Additionally, the majority states "[a]ny claim ... [is] based on an injury suffered in a foreign country[,]" id. at 258, a place the majority acknowledges "the United States has no formal control or de facto sovereignty." Id. at 270. Nevertheless, the majority determined that the Fifth Amendment is applicable in this case. At its heart, this determination is based on the dubious assessment that there is an undefined area on the Mexican side of the U.S.-Mexico border which is analogous to the United States Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The United States' presence at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, is based on both a lease and a treaty. Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723, 764 (2008). Furthermore, "the United States 'has maintained complete and uninterrupted control of [Guantanamo Bay] for over 100 years.' " Majority Op. at 269 (quoting Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 768). The same cannot be said of the Mexican side of the border. I reject the proposition that occasional exercises of "hard power across the border," id. at 269, and practices such as " 'preinspection' examination and inspection of passengers," id. at 270, have somehow transformed a portion of northern Mexico into anything resembling the Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay. If the fact that the "United States exerts and has exerted powerful influence over northern Mexico," id. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted), justifies application of the Fifth Amendment in a strip along the border, how wide is that strip? Is the Fifth Amendment applicable in all of Ciudad Juarez or even the entire state of Chihuahua? Ultimately, the majority's approach devolves into a line drawing game which is entirely unnecessary because there is a border between the United States and Mexico.

To be clear, the majority's opinion represents a significant expansion of Fifth Amendment protections which is not supported by precedent. Because I am persuaded that the Fifth Amendment does not protect a non-citizen with no connections to the United States who suffered an injury in Mexico where the United States has no formal control or de facto sovereignty, I would affirm the district court's judgment in favor of Agent Mesa on the Fifth Amendment claim.

EP-1-CV-31-DB

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

On this day, the Court considered Defendant Jesus Mesa, Jr.'s "First Amended FRCP 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss" ("Motion to Dismiss"), filed in the above-captioned cause on August 1, 2011. Also before the Court is Plaintiffs Jesus C. Hernandez, et al.'s Response, filed on August 2, 2011. For the reasons that follow, the Court finds that the instant Motion should be granted.

BACKGROUND AND PROCEDURAL POSTURE

The tragic facts in this case are well known; as such, the Court provides only a brief summary here. On June 7, 2010, fifteen-year old Sergio Adrian Hernández Güereca ("Decedent") while standing on the Mexican side of the border separating the United States and Mexico was shot to death by United States Border Patrol Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr. ("Agent Mesa"), who was standing on the American side of the border when the incident occurred. Plaintiffs filed their Original Complaint under cause number EP-11-CV-027-DB in early January 2011, alleging claims against the United States of America ("the United States") and various federal agencies under the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA"), the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), and the United States Constitution ("the Constitution"). Moreover, Plaintiffs alleged claims against unknown border patrol agents under the Constitution.

On June 8, 2011, Plaintiffs filed an Amended Complaint, and on June 27, 2011, Plaintiffs filed their Second Amended Complaint. On August 11, 2011, the Court entered an order dismissing and severing all claims against the United States from the instant action. The same day, the Court entered final judgment pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 58. On August 15, 2011, the Court entered an amended final judgment, dismissing Plaintiffs' claims against the United States with prejudice.

On August 22, 2011, Plaintiffs filed their Third Amended Complaint. The Third Amended Complaint raises allegations against Defendants Ramiro Cordero, Scott A. Luck, Victor Manjarrez, Jr., and Carla L. Provost. As to Agent Mesa, the Third Amended Complaint alleges that Agent Mesa acted unreasonably by using excessive, deadly force against Decedent in violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution pursuant to Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971) ("Bivens claims"). Specificaly, Plaintiffs alleges that "Mesa shot Decedent ... while attempting to apprehend him ... on suspicion of illegal entry into the United States." Agent Mesa's Motion to dismiss followed.

LEGAL STANDARD

A. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6)

Defendant files the instant Motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) ("Rule12(b)(6)"). To determine whether a claim survives a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, courts engage in a two step analysis. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal,_U.S._, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1948-50 (2009); see also Edwards v. A.H. Cornell & Son, Inc., 610 F.3d 217, 219 (3d Cir. 2010). First, courts review the complaint, separating assertions of fact from legal conclusions. See id. "[T]he tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949. Moreover, "[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id. Second, courts determine "whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim for relief." Edwards, 610 F.3d at 219 (internal quotations omitted). Whether a claim is plausible is context-specific, requiring "the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950.

B. Federal Bivens Actions

Pursuant to Bivens "the victim of a Fourth Amendment violation by federal officers acting under color of their authority may bring suit for money damages against the officers in federal court." Schweiker v. Chilicky, 487 U.S. 412, 421 (1988). Since deciding Bivens, the Supreme Court has recognized a cause of action for damages against federal officers for violations of the Fifth Amendment as well. Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979). Bivens actions are akin to those brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.[1] Andrade v. Chojnacki, 65 F. Supp. 2d 431, 452 (W.D. Tex. 1999). Therefore, as with cases brought under § 1983, the defense of qualified immunity is also available to federal officers sued under Bivens. Id.

"The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials 'from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'" Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 231 (2009) (quoting Harlow v. Fitzgeral, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982). To resolve government officials' qualified immunity claims, courts engage in a two-step inquiry. See Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001) (overturned on other grounds). First, a court determines whether "[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right?" Id. Second, a court determines "whether the right was clearly established ... undertaken in light of the specific context of the case." Id. Courts, however, are "permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand." Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236.

[1] Section 1983 provides a cause of action against persons acting under color of state law for actions that violate a right secured by the Constitution or federal statute. 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983 (West 2003).

DICUSSION

In the instant Motion, Agent Mesa's argument is based solely on the first step of the two-pronged qualified immunity inquiry: do the facts alleged show that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? Specifically, Agent Mesa argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Decedent was neither protected by the Fourth nor the Fifth Amendments to the Constitution. The Court addresses Agent Mesa's arguments as to Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim before turning to those responding to Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment claim.

A. Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Claim

Here, Agent Mesa argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Decedent was an alien without voluntary attachments to the United States, who never entered the country, and because the Supreme Court held in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), that an alien with no voluntary attachment to the United States has no extraterritorial Fourth Amendments rights. In response, Plaintiffs argue that Martinez-Aguero v. Gonzales, 459 F.3d 618 (5th Cir. 2006), demands the extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment for excessive force inflicted by United States border patrol officers at ports of entry. The Court evaluates these arguments below.

The Fourth Amendment provides in relevant part that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated ...." U.S. CONST. amend. IV. "[A]ll claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure' of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its 'reasonableness' standard, rather than under a 'substantive due process' approach." Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989) (emphasis in original). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has restricted the Fourth Amendment's reach based on the citizenship of the person claiming its protections and based on whether the alleged violation of the Fourth Amendment occurred within the territory of the United States or abroad.

In United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, United States Drug Enforcement Agency ("DEA") officers, working in conjunction with Mexican federal police, seized incriminating documents from the Mexican residences of a criminal defendant. 494 U.S. at 262-63. The district court granted the defendant's motion to suppress, holding that "the Fourth Amendment applied to the searches and that the DEA agents had failed to justify searching [the defendant's] premises without a warrant." Id. at 263. The court of appeals affirmed. Id. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that that "the Fourth Amendment has no application" where "[a]t the time of the search, [the individual seeking its protections] was a citizen and resident of Mexico with no voluntary attachment to the United States, and the place searched was located in Mexico." *Id.*at 274-75.

Here, Agent Mesa asks the Court to dismiss Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim given the Supreme Court's holding in Verdugo-Urquidez. Indeed, it is undisputed that Decedent—a resident and citizen of Mexico—was an alien, without voluntary ties to the United States, standing in Mexico when he was killed. Nevertheless, Plaintiffs argue that Martinez-Aguero demands the extraterritorial application of the Fourth Amendment for excessive force inflicted by United States border patrol officers at ports of entry. In Martinez-Aguero, a Mexican citizen and resident who accompanied her aunt once a month to the Social Security office in El Paso, Texas was stopped by United States immigration officials at the border "within the zone outside the port of entry but within the territorial United States." 459 F.3d at 620. An immigration official "grabbed [the Mexican national's] arms, twisted them behind her back, pushed her into a concrete barrier, which hit her in the stomach and then started kicking her with his [the immigration officer's] knees in her lower back." Id. at 621(internal quotations omitted). The plaintiff brought a claim under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments for excessive use of force. Id. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit ("the Fifth Circuit") affirmed. Id. On appeal, the defendant argued that the plaintiff lacked constitutional rights because although she was in the territorial United States when the incident occurred, she had not been admitted into the country, and as such, the "entry-fiction" doctrine required the court to treat the incident as if it had occurred in Mexico. Id. at 622, 623. Nevertheless, the Fifth Circuit found that the entry-fiction doctrine only applied in immigration and deportation cases and proceeded to determine whether the plaintiff had sufficient voluntary connections to the country. Id. 624. The Fifth Circuit affirmed the district court's decision, finding that the plaintiff had sufficient voluntary contacts because "her regular and lawful entry into the United States pursuant to a valid border-crossing card and her acquiescence in the U.S. system of immigration constitute her voluntary acceptance of societal obligations, rising to the level of 'substantial connections.'" Id.

The instant case can be distinguished from Martinez-Aguero. Unlike Martinez-Aguero, where the plaintiff was in the territorial United States when the incident occurred, it is undisputed that, in this case, Decedent was outside the United States when shot. Moreover, unlike Martinez-Aguero, where the Fifth Circuit found that the plaintiff had voluntary connections, here, Plaintiffs plead nothing in the Third Amendment Complaint to indicate that Decedent had any voluntary connections to the United States. The Court notes that under the heading "Sergio was Entitled to Fifth Amendment Due Process of Law," Plaintiffs' Response briefly states that "Mesa ignores the most obviously sufficient connection between Sergio and the United States, the connection supplied by Mesa himself: Sergio was killed by the actions of a United States government employee acting within the scope of his U.S. government employment." Nevertheless, while this may be a tragic connection to this country, it was not voluntary, and voluntary connections are dispositive in determining whether an alien outside the United States can avail himself of the Fourth Amendment's protections. Finally, the Court briefly addresses Plaintiffs' suggestion that Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), overturned Verdugo-Urquidez.

In short, Plaintiffs argue that after Boumediene, any notion that the Constitution does not apply extraterritorially to non-citizens is untenable because the Supreme Court in Boumediene held that aliens detained in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba had the constitutional privilege of habeas corpus. 553 U.S. at 732. Nevertheless, Boumediene is inapposite as its holding says nothing of the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures. Without more, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim against Agent

Mesa is dismissed. The Court now turns to Agent Mesa's argument under the Fifth Amendment.

B. Fifth Amendment Claim

In his Motion, Agent Mesa petitions the Court to dismiss Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim under the Fifth Amendment, arguing that aliens have no extraterritorial Fifth Amendment rights. To support this argument, Agent Mesa cites to dicta in Verdugo-Urquidez, wherein the Supreme Court states as follows:

> The [Johnson v.] Eisentrager[, 330 U.S. 763 (1950)] opinion acknowledged that in some cases constitutional provisions extend beyond the citizenry: the alien has been accorded a generous and ascending scale of rights as he increases his identity with our society. [] But our rejection of extraterritorial application of the Fifth Amendment was emphatic.

494 U.S. at 269 (internal quotations omitted). In response, Plaintiffs argue that Boumediene "decisively rejected the argument . . . that the Constitution stops where de jure sovereignty ends." In other words, Plaintiffs contend that because the Supreme Court once found that a Constitutional right applies outside the United States, this Court should find that other constitutional rights also apply extraterritorially. Nevertheless, the Court need not determine whether the Fifth Amendment applies extraterritorial to a person in Decedent's shoes, because as explained below, Plaintiffs otherwise fail to state a claim for which relief can be granted under the facts presented.

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution provides in relevant part that "[n]o person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

U.S. CONST. amend. V. Nevertheless, as mentioned above, "all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure' of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its 'reasonableness' standard, rather than under a 'substantive due process' approach." Graham, 490 U.S. at 395. While "[n]ot all encounters between law enforcement officers and citizens are seizures for purposes of the Fourth Amendment," a seizure occurs "when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of the citizen." United States v. Mask, 330 F.3d 330, 336 (5th Cir. 2003) (internal quotations omitted). Here, Agent Mesa's use of force against Decedent amounted to a seizure, as an "[a]pprehension by the use of deadly force is a seizure." Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 187 (5th Cir. 2011). Therefore, under Graham, Plaintiffs fail to state a claim under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, and the Court finds that Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment claim against Agent Mesa should be dismissed.

CONCLUSION

The Court finds that Plaintiffs' Fourth and Fifth Amendment claims against Agent Mesa should be dismissed. First, Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim against Agent Mesa is foreclosed by Verdugo-Urquidez. Decedent has no Fourth Amendment protections because he is an alien with no voluntary ties to the United States who was in Mexico when the incident occurred. Second, claims for excessive use of force are properly brought under the Fourth Amendment and not the Fifth Amendment. Therefore, Plaintiffs fail to state a claim under the Fifth Amendment.

Accordingly, IT HEREBY ORDERED that Defendant Jesus Mesa, Jr.'s "First Amended FRCP 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss" is GRANTED.

SIGNED this 17th day of February, 2012.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

DAVID BRIONES, Senior District Judge.

On this day, the Court considered Defendant the United States of America's ("the United States" or "the Government") "Motion to Dismiss the First Through Ninth and Eleventh Claims of the Plaintiffs' Original Complaint," filed in the above captioned cause on June 6, 2011, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1).[1] Therein, the Government petitions the Court to dismiss with prejudice Plaintiffs Jesus C. Hernandez, et al.'s First through Ninth and Eleventh claims filed in Plaintiffs' Original Complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Also before the Court are Plaintiffs' Response[2] and the Government's Reply filed June 20, and June 28, 2011, respectively. For the reasons stated below, the Court is of the opinion that the Government's Motion should be granted.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL POSTURE

On Monday, June 7, 2010, fifteen-year-old Sergio Adrian Hernández Güereca ("Hernández") and a group of friends were playing in the cement culvert that separates the United States from Mexico near the Paso Del Norte Port of Entry, one of four international ports of entry linking El Paso, Texas, with Ciudad Juarez, Chihuahua, Mexico. The young boys were playing a game in which they would touch the barbed-wire fence between the United States and Mexico and then run back down the incline. While playing, United States Border Patrol Agent, Jesus Mesa, Jr., aka Jesus Meza, Jr. ("Agent Mesa"), detained one of the boys. Hernandez retreated to the Mexican side of the border and observed Agent Mesa from underneath a pillar of the international bridge. Agent Mesa then pointed his weapon at Hernandez and shot his firearm across the border at least twice. Hernandez was fatally injured, having been shot at least once in the face. Additional United States Border Patrol agents subsequently arrived on the scene, but failed to render aid to Hernandez. All agents then left the scene. Eventually, Mexican police arrived and pronounced Hernandez dead.

On January 17, 2011, Plaintiffs filed their Original Complaint with the Court alleging that the Government, unknown federal employees, and various federal agencies[3] were liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA"), the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), and the United States Constitution for Hernandez's death. On June 8, 2011, Plaintiffs filed an Amended Complaint, which is different from the Original Complaint in two regards: (1) it names Agent Mesa and (2) it describes how Plaintiffs would serve process upon Agent Mesa.

On June 9, 2011, the Court entered an order granting the Government leave to file the instant Motion in excess of ten pages and held that Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint did not moot the Government's Motion to Dismiss. On June 18, 2011, Plaintiffs filed their Motion for Leave to file their Second Amended Complaint. On June 27, 2011, the Court granted Plaintiffs' Motion for Leave to file their Second Amended Complaint and held that Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint also did not moot the instant Motion.

The claims before the Court on this Motion are Claims One through Nine and Eleven. Plaintiffs bring their First through Seventh Claims under the FTCA. The First Claim alleges wrongful death under the FTCA against the United States based on assault and battery;

[3] Plaintiffs have sued the following federal agencies: the United States Department of Homeland Security, the United States Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, the United States Border Patrol, the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and the United States Department of Justice.

the Second Claim alleges wrongful death under the FTCA against the United States based on negligence; in their Third Claim, Plaintiffs allege under the FTCA that Agent Mesa, acting in his official capacity, used excessive and deadly force against Hernandez; the Fourth Claim is under the FTCA and alleges that unknown federal agents, acting in their official capacity, negligently adopted policies that violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; the Fifth Claim is against the United States for negligent failure to adopt policies to protect Hernandez's constitutional rights under the FTCA; in their Sixth Claim, Plaintiffs bring a cause of action against the United States under the FTCA for intentionally failing to adopt policies that would prevent a violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; and the Seventh Claim alleges a cause of action against the United States under the FTCA for intentionally failing to adopt policies to prevent a violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.

Plaintiffs bring their Eighth and Ninth Claims under the United States Constitution. Under the Eighth Claim, Plaintiffs allege that the United States violated Plaintiffs' Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights, while Claim Nine alleges that the United States failed to adopt policies that would have prevented a violation of Hernandez's Fourth and Fifth Amendment Rights. Finally, Plaintiffs bring their Eleventh Claim under the law of nations against all Defendants, invoking the Court's jurisdiction under the ATS. The Court now addresses the instant Motion.

STANDARD

The Government files the instant Motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) ("Rule 12(b)(1)"), averring that the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over claims against the United States. A motion under Rule 12(b)(1) allows a party to challenge the subject matter jurisdiction of the district court to hear a case. Ramming v. United States, 281 F.3d 158, 161 (5th Cir. 2001). The party asserting jurisdiction bears the burden of proving that jurisdiction exists. Id. If the party asserting jurisdiction does not meet its burden, the court must dismiss the action. See Fed R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3). A court should only grant a motion to dismiss for subject matter jurisdiction "if it appears certain that the plaintiff cannot prove any set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle plaintiff to relief." Ramming, 281 F.3d at 161.

DISCUSSION

The Government argues that Plaintiffs' First through Ninth and Eleventh claims should be dismissed because (1) the United States is the only proper Defendant as to those claims; (2) the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for Plaintiffs' claims under the FTCA because those claims arose in a foreign country; and (3) the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for Plaintiffs' claims under the ATS. Plaintiffs respond that the Court has subject matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' FTCA claims because those claims did not arise in a foreign country. Moreover, Plaintiffs aver that the ATS does waive the United States' sovereign immunity and cite Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), for that proposition. Finally, Plaintiffs seek leave to amend their pleadings a third time.

The Government replies that Plaintiffs' Response lacks merit as Plaintiffs have mischaracterized the United States Supreme Court's ("the Supreme Court") interpretation of Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004), in arguing that Plaintiffs' FTCA claims did not arise in a foreign country. Further, the Government contends that the Supreme Court did not hold in Rasul that the ATS waives the United States' sovereign immunity, but that custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba is not a bar to jurisdiction under the ATS. Finally, the Government does not address Plaintiffs' request for leave to amend their pleadings. The Court evaluates the Parties' arguments below.

As a preliminary matter, the Court notes that the United States is indeed the only party defendant as to Plaintiffs' FTCA and ATS claims. "Under the Westfall Act [28 U.S.C. § 2679(b)(1)], federal employees have absolute immunity from suit for common-law tort claims related to acts undertaken within the scope of their federal employment." Dolenz v. Fahey, 298 Fed.Appx. 380, 381 (5th Cir. 2008). "[T]he Westfall Act provides that, if the Attorney General or his designee certifies that a federal employee was acting within the scope of his employment when an alleged act or omission occurred, then the lawsuit automatically is converted to one against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, the federal employee is dismissed as a party, and the United States is substituted as the defendant." In re Iraq & Afghan. Detainees Litig., 479 F.Supp.2d 85, 110 (D.D.C.2007); see also 28 § 2679(d)(1) (West 2011). Courts have applied the Westfall Act to claims under the ATS asserting violations of the law of nations. See In re Iraq & Afghan. Detainees Litig., 479 F.Supp.2d at 112.

On June 20, 2011, the United States filed a "Notice of Substitution and Application for Order Thereon," wherein the Government agreed to substitute for Agent Mesa by operation of law as party defendant as to all of Plaintiffs' claims sounding in common law tort under the FTCA and the ATS pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2679. Plaintiffs did not oppose this substitution. Indeed, in their Response to the instant Motion, Plaintiffs state that "[n]ow that the United States has moved for substitution and filed the appropriate certification to the Court, Plaintiffs do not oppose substitution." Therefore, the Court granted the Government's request, and in an Order dated June 24, 2011 ("June 24 Order"), the Court dismissed all claims against Agent Mesa under the FTCA and ATS. The result of the Court's June 24 Order is that the United States is now the only party defendant as to all of Plaintiffs' claims under the FTCA and ATS. Having established that the United States is the only party defendant as to all of Plaintiffs' claims, the Court now turns to the question of whether the United States has waived its sovereign immunity for Plaintiffs' claims.

I. Whether the United States waived its Sovereign Immunity for Plaintiffs' Claims

"Liability may be imposed upon the United States only if two requirements are met: (1) there must be a waiver of sovereign immunity; and (2) there must be a source of substantive law that provides a claim for relief." In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc., 468 F.3d 248, 260 (5th Cir. 2006) (Dennis, J., concurring). With respect to federal sovereign immunity, " '[t]he basic rule ... is that the United States cannot be sued at all without the consent of Congress.' " Freeman v. United States, 556 F.3d 326, 334–35 (5th Cir. 2009) (quoting Block v. N.D. ex rel. Bd. of Univ. & Sch. Lands, 461 U.S. 273, 287 (1983)). "Plaintiffs bear the burden of showing Congress's unequivocal waiver of sovereign immunity." Id. at 334 (internal quotation omitted). "Because sovereign immunity is jurisdictional in nature ... Congress's waiver of it must be unequivocally expressed in statutory text and will not be implied...." Id. (internal quotations and citations omitted). Therefore, it follows that a federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over claims for which Congress has not waived sovereign immunity. Id. The Court first examines whether Congress has waived sovereign immunity for Plaintiffs' claims under the FTCA.

A. Sovereign Immunity under the FTCA

The FTCA allows a person to sue the United States for the negligence or other tortious conduct of its employees acting within the scope of employment in situations where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the tort occurred. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1346(b)(1) (West 2011). Therefore, the statute is both a waiver of the United States' sovereign immunity and a source of substantive law that imposes liability on the Government for the torts of its employees under certain circumstances.[4] In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc., 468 F.3d at 260 (Dennis, J., concurring); see also 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1346(b)(1), 2674. This waiver is not unlimited, however, and for policy reasons, Congress decided that the FTCA would also categorically exclude liability for some harms. In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc., 468 F.3d at 260–61 (Dennis, J., concurring). For example, Congress precluded Government liability when a United States employee exercises a discretionary function. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2680(a) (West 2011). Moreover, Congress has immunized Government employees from intentional

---

[4] The statute provides in relevant part that "the district courts ... shall have exclusive jurisdiction of civil actions on claims against the United States, for money damages ... for injury or loss of property, or personal injury or death caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of an employee of the Government while acting within the scope of his office or employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred." § 1346(b)(1).

torts, except when the intentional tort was committed by an investigative or law enforcement officer of the United States. § 2680(h). Finally, Congress conferred immunity on Government employees against liability from torts arising in a foreign country. § 2680(k).

Although the FTCA's foreign country exception clearly states that the provisions of the FTCA do not apply to "[a]ny claim arising in a foreign country," prior to 2004, some federal courts allowed plaintiffs' claims to withstand a motion to dismiss if plaintiffs could show that the act or omission giving rise to a tort occurred in the United States even when the claimant suffered injuries abroad. See e.g. Mulloy v. United States, 884 F.Supp. 622, 632 (D.Mass.1995). Nevertheless, in 2004, in Sosa, the Supreme Court unequivocally held that "the FTCA's foreign country exception bars all claims based on an injury suffered in a foreign country, regardless of where the tortious act or omission occurred." 542 U.S. at 712. Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's unambiguous directive, Plaintiffs argue that Sosa does not control the case at bar. Therefore, the Court must first determine whether it is bound by Sosa's clear holding in the instant cause.

In Sosa, Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") agents hired Jose Francisco Sosa ("Sosa") to abduct Mexican physician Humberto Alvarez–Machain ("Alvarez") in Mexico to stand trial in federal court in the United States because Alvarez assisted in torturing a fellow DEA agent. Id. at 697–98. Alvarez was acquitted of the federal criminal charges but subsequently filed a civil action against Sosa under the FTCA and ATS. The district court dismissed Alvarez's FTCA claim but awarded summary judgment and damages on Alvarez's ATS claim. Id. at 699. A three judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ("the Ninth Circuit") affirmed the ATS claim but reversed the district court's dismissal of the FTCA claim; a divided en banc panel of the Ninth Circuit came to the same conclusion. Id. In reaching its holding on Alvarez's FTCA claim, the Ninth Circuit relied on the "headquarters doctrine." Id. at 701. Under the headquarters doctrine, "the foreign country exception [to the FTCA] does not exempt the United States from suit for acts or omissions occurring [in the United States] which have their operative effect in another country." Id. (internal quotations omitted). Thus, the Ninth Circuit reasoned "that [ ] since Alvarez's abduction in Mexico was the direct result of wrongful acts of planning and direction by DEA agents located in California, 'Alvarez's abduction fits the headquarters doctrine like a glove.' " Id. at 702 (quoting Alvarez-Machain v. U.S., 331 F.3d 604, 638 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc)). Thus, based on the headquarters doctrine, the Ninth Circuit held that Alvarez's claim did not arise in a foreign country. Id.

The Supreme Court reversed, rejecting the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of the foreign country exception. Id. at 712. In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court found reason to be skeptical of the Ninth Circuit's reliance on the headquarters doctrine because proximate cause[5] was needed to "connect the domestic breach of duty (at headquarters) with the action in the foreign country ... producing the foreign harm or injury." Id. at 703. The Supreme Court expressed doubt that the acts of the DEA agents sitting in California were proximate causes of Alvarez's harm, given that "the actions of Sosa and others in Mexico were just as surely proximate causes, as well." Id. at 704.

[5] The Supreme Court defined proximate cause as "causation substantial enough and close enough to the harm to be recognized by law" and found that "a given proximate cause need not be, and frequently is not, the exclusive proximate cause of harm." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 704.

Regardless, the Supreme Court reached its decision in Sosa "simply because the harm occurred on foreign soil." Id. at 703. The Supreme Court explained that when Congress passed the FTCA, "the dominant principle in choice-of-law analysis for tort cases was lex loci delicti: courts generally applied the law of the place where the injury occurred." Id. at 705. As a result, if the injury occurred in a foreign country, a federal court in the United States would have to apply foreign law to determine the tortfeasor's liability, and applying foreign substantive law in a federal court is precisely what Congress wanted to avoid in passing the foreign country exception to the FTCA. Id. at 706–07. Further, the Supreme Court found that even if a federal court did not have to apply the tort law of a foreign nation, a claimant injured in a foreign country would still be barred from bringing a claim against the United States because Congress did not write the foreign country exception to apply only "when foreign law would be applied." Id. at 711. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that "the FTCA's foreign country exception bars all claims based on any injury suffered in a foreign country, regardless of where the tortious act or omission occurred." Id.

Here, Plaintiffs ask the Court to ignore Sosa's explicit holding because unlike in Sosa, where the Supreme Court expressed doubt about whether the proximate cause of Alvarez's harms had occurred in the United States, in the instant cause "[i]t is indisputable that each and every proximate cause of [Hernandez's] injuries and death occurred on United States territory." Even if each and every proximate cause of Hernandez's injuries occurred on United States territory, the Supreme Court also reached its holding in Sosa simply because the harm occurred on foreign soil. See id. at 703.

Therefore, the Court is of the opinion that if Hernandez suffered his injuries in Mexico—a foreign country—the Court would lack subject matter jurisdiction to hear Plaintiffs' FTCA claims given Sosa's clear holding. Yet, Plaintiffs also argue that Hernandez did not suffer his injuries in Mexico. The Court must therefore determine where Hernandez suffered his injuries.

Plaintiffs concede that Hernandez was standing underneath the Mexican side of the Paso Del Norte Bridge when Agent Mesa shot him. Nevertheless, Hernandez argues that the assault "occurred on United States' [sic] territory" because once Agent Mesa cocked his gun and put his finger on the trigger, it was not necessary for the bullet to strike Hernandez to "invoke assault." The United States replies that because Hernandez was standing in Mexico when he perceived Agent Mesa's threat, Hernandez suffered any injury in Mexico and not the United States. The Court thus examines what is required to state a claim for civil assault under Texas law to determine whether Plaintiffs properly characterize the injury as one occurring in the United States and not Mexico.

Under Texas law, a plaintiff must establish the elements of criminal assault to state a claim for civil assault. See Johnson v. Davis, 178 S.W.3d 230, 240 (Tex.App.-Houston [14th Dist.] 2005, pet. denied). The Texas Penal Code provides for three categories of assault. See Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01 (West 2011). Here, Plaintiffs bring their claims under a type of assault called "assault-by-threat." Olivas v. Texas, 203 S.W.3d 341, 345 (Tex.Crim.App.2006). A person commits an assault-by-threat when he "intentionally or knowingly threatens another with imminent bodily injury" TEX. PENAL CODE ANN. § 22.01(a)(2) (West 2011). For the State to convict a defendant of criminal assault, the State must prove that a threat occurred but the State need not necessarily prove that the victim perceived the threat. Olivas, 203 S.W.3d at 346; Teeter v. Texas, No. PD–1169–09, 2010 WL 3702360, at *6 (Tex.Crim.App. Sept. 22, 2010). In contrast, under civil assault, "the victim must be shown factually to have experienced apprehension or fear." See Olivas, 203 S.W.3d at 346–47. In determining whether a civil assault has occurred, courts will look at the physical distance between the victim and the alleged perpetrator to determine whether the victim felt the harm of the assault. See Vietnamese Fishermen's Ass'n v. Knights of Ku Klux Klan, 518 F.Supp. 993, 1012 (S.D.Tex.1981) ("There is no assault where the defendant is too far away to do any harm.").

Here, Plaintiffs aver that "[t]he assault against [Hernandez's] rights occurred at the very moment that Agent Mesa lifted his gun, pointed it at [Hernandez's] head and pulled the trigger." Yet any rights Hernandez may have had were held in Mexico since Hernandez was standing in Mexico when Agent Mesa allegedly perpetrated the assault. Moreover, the fact that courts look to (1) whether the victim apprehended the assault, Olivas, 203 S.W.3d at 346–47, and (2) the physical distance between the victim and the alleged perpetrator of the assault to determine whether an assault has occurred, Vietnamese Fishermen's Ass'n, 518 F.Supp. at 1012, further supports the conclusion that the injury in an assault occurs where and when the victim perceives the assault. Therefore, the weight that Plaintiffs place on the moment when the assault occurred is misguided and irrelevant for the purpose of determining where Hernandez suffered his injury.

Finally, to the extent that Plaintiffs argue that civil assault-by-threat can be proven under Texas law without establishing that a plaintiff experienced fear or apprehension would run afoul of the standing requirements of the federal courts. "Standing to sue in any Article III court is ... a federal question which does not depend on the party's prior standing in state court." Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 804 (1985). To have standing to sue in federal court, a plaintiff must have suffered an "injury in fact—an invasion of a legally protected interest which is ... concrete and particularized." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992). An injury is "particularized" when it "affect[s] the plaintiff in a personal and individual way." Id. at 561 n. 1. The only way that Hernandez could have been affected in a "personal and individual way" is if he felt the harm of the assault; because Hernandez was standing in Mexico when Agent Mesa allegedly assaulted him, there was no other place where he could have felt the harm.[6] As such, the Court finds that Hernandez suffered his harms in Mexico.

Having decided that Sosa applies to the case at bar and that Hernandez suffered his injuries in Mexico, the Court now grants the Government's Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' First through Seventh Claims because Congress did not waive the United States' sovereign [6] Plaintiffs also argue that Hernandez's negligence claim is cognizable in this case because "the last act necessary to establish negligence against Agent Mesa and the United States occurred in the United States" Plaintiffs misstate the law of negligence. To state a claim in negligence, a plaintiff must prove "a legal duty owed by one person to another, a breach of that duty, and damages proximately caused by the breach." D. Houston, Inc. v. Love, 92 S.W.3d 450, 454 (Tex.2002). Here, Plaintiffs Second Amended Complaint states that Plaintiff was standing in Mexico when Agent Mesa allegedly shot and killed him. As such, it is undisputed that the damages, the last act needed to state a claim in negligence, occurred in Mexico. Therefore, the Court finds the FTCA's foreign country exception bars Plaintiffs' negligence claims against the United States, its officers and agencies.

---

immunity for injuries suffered in a foreign country, "regardless of where the tortious act or omission occurred." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 712.

B. Sovereign Immunity for Constitutional Torts

The United States next argues that Plaintiffs' Eighth and Ninth Claims should be dismissed because the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for constitutional torts under the FTCA. Plaintiffs concede that the United States is not a proper party as to these claims. Therefore, the Court grants the United States' Motion as to the Eighth and Ninth Claims in Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint because it agrees that the United States has not waived its sovereign immunity for constitutional torts under the FTCA. See Spotts v. United States, 613 F.3d 559, 569 n. 7 (5th Cir. 2010).

C. Sovereign Immunity and the ATS

Finally, the Court determines whether the ATS waives the United States' sovereign immunity. The ATS is a jurisdictional statute, conferring jurisdiction upon the federal courts to "hear claims in a very limited category defined by the law of nations and recognized at common law." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 712. Because "Congress's waiver of [sovereign immunity] must be unequivocally expressed in statutory text and will not be implied," Freeman, 556 F.3d at 334–35, the Court looks first to the statutory language to determine if it waives the United States' sovereign immunity. The statute provides that "[t]he district court shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." 28 U.S.C.A. § 1350 (West 2011). It is patent from the statute's plain language that a waiver of sovereign immunity is not "unequivocally expressed" as the ATS says nothing about sovereign immunity or a waiver. See Canadian Transport Co. v. United States, 663 F.2d 1081, 1092 (D.C. Cir. 1980); see also Industria Panificadora, S.A. v. United States, 957 F.2d 886, 887 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (per curiam), cert. denied 506 U.S. 908 (1992). Notwithstanding the plain language of the statute, Plaintiffs insist that the ATS waives the United States' sovereign immunity because the Supreme Court pronounced in Rasul, that "indeed, [the ATS] explicitly confers the privilege of suing for an actionable tort committed in violations of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States on aliens alone." 542 U.S. at 485 (internal quotation omitted). Plaintiffs fundamentally misapprehend the holding in Rasul.

In Rasul, the Supreme Court decided "the narrow but important question whether United States courts lack jurisdiction to consider challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured abroad in connection with hostilities and incarcerated at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, Cuba." Id. at 470. Petitioners in Rasul sued former President George W. Bush, among other federal employees, invoking the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia ("District Court") under the ATS. The District Court dismissed the petitioners' ATS claim and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that "the District Court correctly dismissed the claims founded on ... [the ATS] for lack of jurisdiction, even to the extent that these claims 'deal only with conditions of confinement and do not sound in habeas,' because petitioners lack the 'privilege of litigation' in U.S. courts." Id. at 484. (quoting Al Odah v. United States, 321 F.3d 1134, 1144 (D.C. Cir. 2003)). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the District Court did have jurisdiction to hear the ATS claim and that the petitioners' confinement in military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba was immaterial to the question of whether the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction over those claims. Id. at 485. The Supreme Court in Rasul said nothing about whether Congress waived the United States' sovereign immunity in the ATS.[7]

Here, Plaintiffs confuse federal jurisdiction with a waiver of sovereign immunity. While the Court may have jurisdiction to hear claims under the ATS because the ATS is merely a jurisdictional statute, "any party asserting jurisdiction under the [ATS to sue the United States] must establish, independent of that statute, that the United States has consented to suit." Tobar v. United States, 639 F.3d 1191, 1196 (9th Cir. 2011) (internal quotations omitted) (holding that the ATS does not waive the United States' sovereign immunity). Moreover, if the United States waives its sovereign immunity in a treaty, the waiver must be unequivocally expressed. See De Archibold v. United States, 499 F.3d 1310, 1313 (Fed. Cir. 2007). Yet, Plaintiffs cite no language in any of the treaties that form the substantive basis for Plaintiffs' ATS claim that indicate that the United States has waived its sovereign immunity for suits in federal court under those treaties. Without more, [7] The Court is not alone in this conclusion; indeed, the Court knows of no case decided before or after Rasul to have ever held that the ATS waives the United States' sovereign immunity; nevertheless, the case reporters are replete with examples of cases finding unambiguously that the ATS does not waive the United States' sovereign immunity. See e.g. Sanchez–Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 207 (D.C. Cir. 1985); Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. United States, 967 F.2d 965, 967–68 (4th Cir. 1992); Rosner v. United States, 231 F.Supp.2d 1202, 1210 (S.D.Fla.2002); Czetwertynski v. United States, 514 F.Supp.2d 592, 596 (S.D.N.Y.2007); Al–Aulaqi v. Obama, 727 F.Supp.2d 1, 43 (D.D.C.2010).

the Court finds that it lacks subject matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims under the ATS and, as such, grants the Government's Motion as to the Eleventh Claim.

II. Plaintiffs' Construed Motion to Amend Pleadings

Having decided that the Court lacks jurisdiction as to all of Plaintiffs' claims against the United States, the Court now addresses Plaintiffs' construed Motion to Amend Pleadings. Here, Plaintiffs seek leave to amend their Second Amended Complaint to refashion claims against the United States as claims against unknown federal agents under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971).

A party may amend its pleading once as a matter of course within twenty-one days of serving it or twenty-one days after service of a motion under Rule 12(b), whichever is earlier. FED.R.CIV.P. 15(a)(1). In all other cases, a party may only amend its pleadings with the written consent of the opposing party or with the court's leave. FED.R.CIV.P. 15(a)(2). Courts must "freely give leave when justice so requires." FED.R.CIV.P. 15(a)(2). Although Rule 15(a) creates a liberal standard for granting leave to amend a complaint, some factors weigh against granting leave. Barnes v. Madison, 79 Fed.Appx. 691, 698 (5th Cir. 2003). These factors, articulated in Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182 (1962), include "undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party by virtue of allowance of the amendment, and futility of amendment." Id. (internal quotations omitted).

In the instant cause, Plaintiffs amended their pleadings once as a matter of right and a second time with the Court's leave. The Court now finds that it would serve the interest of justice to allow Plaintiffs leave to file a third amended complaint. Nevertheless, the Court cautions the Plaintiffs, in the strongest terms possible, that it will not grant Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint a fourth time.

III. Severance of Claims against the United States

Finally, the Court sua sponte considers whether the claims against the United States should be severed from those against Agent Mesa. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 21 ("Rule 21") provides in relevant part that "[o]n motion or on its own, the court may at any time, on just terms, add or drop a party. The court may also sever any claim against a party." FED.R.CIV.P. 21. "Rule 21 is an appropriate vehicle to sever or dismiss the claims of even properly joined parties." Blum v. Gen. Elec. Co., 547 F.Supp.2d 717, 722 (W.D.Tex.2008). By severing claims under Rule 21, a district court creates two separate actions by which severed claims may proceed as discrete, independent actions. Allied Elevator, Inc. v. E. Tex. State Bank, 965 F.2d 34, 36 (5th Cir. 1992). District courts may then render final judgment in "either one of the resulting two actions notwithstanding the continued existence of unresolved claims in the other." Id. (internal quotation omitted). Ultimately, district courts have broad discretion to sever claims under Rule 21. Brunet v. United Gas Pipeline Co., 15 F.3d 500, 505 (5th Cir. 1994).

In the instant Order, the Court dismisses all claims against the United States. As such, if the Court severs the claims against the United States, the Court may enter final judgment and allow Plaintiffs to appeal the instant Order, if they so choose, without having to wait for a resolution on their Bivens claims against Agent

Mesa. Therefore, the Court finds that the claims against the United States should be severed from those against Agent Mesa and all unknown agents.

CONCLUSION

After due consideration, the Court finds that the Government's Motion should be granted in its entirety. The United States is party defendant as to all claims against Agent Mesa under the FTCA and the ATS. Moreover, Congress has not waived the United States' sovereign immunity under the FTCA when the tort arises in a foreign country. Because the harm that Plaintiffs allege under the FTCA was felt in Mexico, Plaintiffs' tort claims under the FTCA arose in a foreign country, therefore the Court dismisses Claims One through Seven. Further, the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for constitutional torts under the FTCA. As such, the Court dismisses Claims Eight and Nine. In addition, Congress did not waive the United States' sovereign immunity under the ATS, and none of the treaties that form the substantive basis of Plaintiffs' ATS claims unequivocally waive the United States' sovereign immunity. It therefore follows that the Court must dismiss Plaintiffs' Eleventh Claim.

The Court also grants Plaintiffs leave to amend their pleadings and finds that it would be in the interest of justice to grant Plaintiffs' construed Motion for Leave to Amend Pleadings. Finally, the Court finds that all claims against the United States should be severed from those against Agent Mesa and all unknown federal agents such that final judgment may be entered as to the United States.

Accordingly, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that Defendant the United States of America's "Motion to Dismiss the First Through Ninth and Eleventh Claims of the Plaintiffs' Original Complaint," is GRANTED.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Plaintiffs Jesus C. Hernandez, et al.'s construed Motion to Amend the Second Amended Complaint is GRANTED.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Plaintiffs are granted leave to amend their Second Amended Complaint within ten days of the date of this Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that all claims asserted against Defendants the United States of America, the United States Department of Homeland Security, the United States Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, the United States Border Patrol, the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and the United States Department of Justice be SEVERED from those claims against Jesus Mesa, Jr. and all unknown Defendants.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Clerk of the Court AMEND the caption in the present action to reflect that claims against Defendant Jesus Mesa, Jr. and all unknown Defendants are no longer included within the above-captioned cause.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the above-captioned cause is DISMISSED.

IT IS FINALLY ORDERED that all other pending motions in the above-captioned cause, if any, are DENIED AS MOOT.

Jury Trial Demanded

PLAINTIFFS' THIRD AMENDED COMPLAINT

Plaintiffs, Jesus Hernández Güereca and María Guadalupe Güereca Bentacour (hereinafter "Plaintiffs"), individually as the surviving parents of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca (hereinafter "Decedent," "Sergio"), and as Successors-in-Interest to the Estate of Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, complain and allege as follows:

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT AND NATURE OF THE CASE

1. Plaintiffs bring this action against Ramiro Cordero ("Cordero"); Scott A. Luck ("Luck"); Victor Manjarrez, Jr. ("Manjarrez"); Jesus Mesa, Jr., aka Jesus Meza, Jr. ("Mesa"), and Carla A. Provost ("Provost"), employees of the United States of America, in their individual capacities, under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), for violation of Plaintiff Decedent's individual constitutional rights guaranteed by the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution as set forth herein.

2. Defendant Jesus Mesa, Jr. used unlawful deadly force in shooting and killing Decedent on June 7, 2010, notwithstanding that Decedent was defenseless, was offering no resistance, had no weapon of any kind, and had not nor was threatening Mesa, or any third party, with harm, deadly or otherwise. Plaintiffs plead that, at all times relevant hereto, Mesa was an employee of the United States of America and, while acting within the course and scope or under the color of his agency with the United States, Mesa maliciously, and/or wrongfully, and/or otherwise tortuously shot Decedent Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca even though he showed no resistance to the Agent's demands, thereby causing Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca's untimely death.

3. Defendants Ramiro Cordero, former United States Border Patrol Special Operations Supervisor, El Paso

Sector; Scott A. Luck, United States Border Patrol, El Paso Sector; and Carla L. Provost, United States Border Patrol Deputy Chief Patrol Agent, El Paso Sector, through their own individual actions, violated Decedent's constitutional rights as guaranteed by the Fourth and Fifth Amendments by tolerating and condoning a pattern of brutality and excessive force by Border Patrol agents; systematically failing to properly and adequately monitor and investigate incidents of brutality or supervise and discipline officers involved in such misconduct; creating an environment to shield agents from liability for their wrongful conduct; and inadequately training officers and agents regarding the appropriate use and restraint of their firearms as weapons. Defendants had actual and/or constructive knowledge that the conduct of their subordinate, Mesa, posed pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to Decedent and their response to that knowledge was so inadequate as to show deliberate indifference or tacit authorization of alleged offensive practices. Defendants' failure to safeguard against constitutional transgressions by Mesa constitutes an actionable wrong under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), and its progeny.

4. Plaintiffs have/will effectuated service of process on Defendants in their individual capacities pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(i)(2), by sending a copy of the summons and Third Amended Complaint via certified mail, return receipt requested, to the following:

JURISDICTION

5. The jurisdiction of this Court is based on 28 U.S.C. § 1331 and Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), and its progeny.

VENUE

6. As more fully set forth herein, Plaintiffs contend that Defendant Mesa's acts occurred on the United States side of the Rio Grande River in El Paso, Texas, in El Paso County, located on the border of the United States and Ciudad Juárez, Mexico. Defendants Cordero, Luck, Manjarrez, and Provost's actions and omissions occurred in El Paso, Texas. Venue is proper in this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1391(b).

CONDITIONS PRECEDENT

7. All conditions precedent have been satisfied prior to filing this suit.

PARTIES

8. At all times relevant hereto, Plaintiff Jesus Hernández Güereca was, and now is, a citizen of the Republic of Mexico.

9. At all times relevant hereto, Plaintiff María Guadalupe Güereca Bentacour was, and now is, a citizen of the Republic of Mexico.

10. At all times relevant hereto, Decedent Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca was a citizen of the Republic of Mexico.

11. At all times relevant hereto, Plaintiff Jesus Hernández Güereca individually as the surviving father of Decedent, and as Successor-in-Interest to the Estate of Decedent, may maintain a Federal Wrongful Death and Survival Action and recover damages for the value of the Decedent's life and the Decedent's pain and suffering.

12. At all times relevant hereto, Plaintiff María Guadalupe Güereca Bentacour individually as the surviving mother of Decedent, and as Successor-in-Interest to the Estate of Decedent, may maintain a Federal Wrongful Death and Survival Action and recover damages for the value of the Decedent's life and the Decedent's pain and suffering.

13. At all times relevant hereto, Defendants Cordero, Luck, Mesa, and Provost were and/or are investigative or law enforcement officers for the United States Border Patrol, acting within the course and scope of their employment, or under the color of such employment, with the United States of America.

14. Plaintiffs believe and thereupon allege that, at all times relevant hereto, Mesa was acting within the course and scope of his employment with the Defendant the United States of America and/or other Defendants on June 7, 2010, when Decedent was wrongfully shot to death.

15. Plaintiffs believe and thereupon allege that, at all times relevant hereto, the United States Bureau of Customs and Border Protection was, and is, a subdivision of the United States Department of Homeland Security—a United States Federal Governmental entity with headquarters in Washington, D.C., and various branch offices throughout the country including this judicial district.

General Factual Allegation Applicable to All Claims for Relief

16. Monday, June 7, 2010 reached a high of 109 degrees in El Paso, Texas. Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca was spending the last few minutes of the day together with his friends in the all-but-dry cement culvert separating the sister countries of Mexico and the United States. Similar to the Native American Indian game "counting coup," Sergio and his friends would physically run up and touch the barbed-wire United States high fence, and then scamper back down the incline. They had no interest in entering the United States. Rather, in a scene as old as time, a group of young boys were simply ending their day laughing and playing under the gathering clouds of a evening summer thunderstorm, before heading back home for dinner and bed.

17. Suddenly, a United States Border Agent, Jesus Mesa, Jr., aka Jesus Meza, Jr., emerged on his bicycle and detained one of the individuals, dragging the young boy along the concrete. Sergio retreated and stood still beneath the pillars of the Paso del Norte Bridge, observing. US Border Patrol Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr., aka Jesus Meza, Jr., then stopped, pointed his weapon across the border, seemingly taking careful aim, and squeezed the trigger at least twice, fatally wounding Sergio with at least one gunshot wound to the face. Sergio, who had been standing safely and legally on his native soil of Mexico, unarmed and unthreatening, lay dead on his back in his blue jeans and sneakers. He was fifteen years old.

18. More US Border Patrol agents arrived briefly, the shooter, Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr., aka Jesus Meza, Jr., picked up his bicycle, and then they all left. No one took any action to render emergency medical aid to Sergio, leaving him dead or dying beneath Paso del Norte Bridge in the Territory of Mexico. Shortly thereafter, Mexican police arrived on scene and pronounced Sergio dead.

19. Almost immediately, FBI spokeswoman Andrea Simmons, prior to discovering the existence of a disturbing video depicting much of the event, issued a false and reprehensible cover-up statement:

> "This agent, who had the second subject detained on the ground, gave verbal commands to the remaining subjects to stop and retreat. However, the subjects surrounded the agent and continued to throw rocks at him. The agent then fired his service weapon several times, striking one subject who later died."

20. This litigation arises from the acts and omissions of the named Defendants acting in concert in their individual capacities, as appropriately pled herein.

21. Plaintiffs further contend that Defendants are individually, jointly, and severally liable for those violations of Decedent's constitutional rights, referenced above and below, in that Defendants have:

(1) tolerated, condoned, and encouraged a pattern of brutality and use of excessive force by members of the United States Department of Homeland Security, United States Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, United States Border Patrol, United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency, and/or United States Department of Justice against citizens from Mexico and Central or South America;

(2) systematically failed to properly and adequately monitor and investigate such incidents and to supervise and discipline the officers involved;

(3) created an environment and culture in which officers and agents are encouraged to shield the misconduct of fellow officers, whereby officers and agents believe they can violate without legal consequence and with impunity the rights of persons such as Decedent;

(4) inadequately trained officers and agents regarding the proper restraint and use of firearms as weapons; and

(5) inadequately elected, trained, monitored, and supervised officers and agents.

FIRST CLAIM FOR RELIEF:
ADOPTION OF POLICIES THAT VIOLATED DECEDENT'S FOURTH AND FIFTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS

22. Plaintiffs repeat and incorporate above paragraphs 1 through 21 inclusive, as though fully set forth in this paragraph 22.

23. Plaintiffs allege that, at all times relevant hereto, Defendants Cordero, Luck, Manjarrez, and Provost, while acting in their respective official capacities, exercised supervision and control over Defendant Mesa. Such Defendants were acting under color of law as law enforcement officers and employees of the United States Government.

24. Plaintiffs allege that such supervisorial Defendants, acting in their respective individual capacities, were authorized final policy-makers. In such capacities, they adopted, acquiesced to, or ratified official customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, which they knew, or should have known, were inadequate regarding the use of deadly force. The inadequacy of such official customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, directly and proximately caused Defendant Mesa to use unreasonable, unconstitutional, and excessive force, i.e. deadly force, in effecting the arrest of Decedent. The use of such force deprived Decedent of his Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. The inadequacy of such customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, manifested a deliberate indifference to the protection of Decedent's constitutional rights and was the moving force, which resulted in the deprivation of Decedent's constitutional rights.

25. As a direct and proximate result of the acts or omissions of such Defendants, Decedent was killed, giving rise to the injuries and damages for which Plaintiffs now complain.

SECOND CLAIM FOR RELIEF: FAILURE TO ADOPT POLICIES WHICH RESULTED IN THE VIOLATION OF DECEDENT'S FOURTH AND FIFTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS

26. Plaintiffs repeat and incorporate above paragraphs 1 through 22, inclusive, as though fully set forth in this paragraph 26.

27. Plaintiffs allege that, at all times relevant hereto, Defendants Cordero, Luck, Manjarrez, and Provost, while acting in their respective official capacities, exercised supervision and control over Defendant Mesa. Such Defendants were acting under color of law as law enforcement officers and employees of the United States Government.

28. Plaintiffs allege that such supervisorial Defendants, acting in their espective individual capacities, were authorized final policy-makers who failed to adopt or ratify official customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, regarding the use of reasonable force in effecting arrests. Such failure directly and proximately caused Defendant Mesa to use unreasonable, unconstitutional, and excessive force, i.e. deadly force, in effecting the arrest of Decedent. The use of such force deprived Decedent of his Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. The failure to adopt such customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, directly and proximately resulted in Decedent being shot by Defendant Mesa. The failure to adopt such customs, policies, procedures, and decisions, including training programs, manifested a deliberate indifference to the protection of Decedent's constitutional rights and was the moving force, which resulted in the deprivation of Decedent's constitutional rights.

29. As a direct and proximate result of the acts or omissions of such Defendants, Decedent was killed, giving rise to the injuries and damages for which Plaintiffs now complain.

THIRD CLAIM FOR RELIEF:
VIOLATION OF FOURTH AND FIFTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS BY JESUS MESA, JR., AKA JESUS MEZA, J

30. Plaintiffs repeat and incorporate above paragraphs 1 through 22, inclusive, as though fully set forth in this paragraph 30.

31. Plaintiffs allege that Defendant Mesa shot Decedent on June 7, 2010, while acting individually under color of law as an employee of the United States of America, United States Department of Homeland Security, United States Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, United States Border Patrol, United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency, and/or United States Department of Justice while attempting to apprehend him in El Paso, Texas on suspicion of illegal entry into the United States.

32. Plaintiffs allege that in shooting Decedent, Mesa acted unreasonably by using excessive, deadly force against Decedent in violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution. At the time of the shooting, Decedent was unarmed and presented no physical threat to Mesa.

33. Plaintiffs allege that Mesa's shooting of Decedent evidences Mesa'a callous disregard for, and deliberate indifference to, Decedent's constitutional rights.

34. As a direct and proximate result of the acts or omissions of Mesa, Decedent was killed, giving rise to the injuries and damages for which Plaintiffs now complain.

WHEREFORE, Plaintiffs pray for judgment against all named and unnamed Defendants as follows:

A. Damages as allowed on each Claim for Relief in an amount according to proof at the time of trial;

B. All together with any interest, pre-and-post judgment, costs and disbursements; and

C. Such other and further relief as this Court deems just and proper.

APPENDIX G

United States District Court
for the District of Arizona

No. 4:14-CV-02251-RCC

Araceli Rodriguez,
Plaintiff,

v.

Lonnie Swartz,
Defendant.

ORDER

INTRODUCTION

This case calls on the Court to answer two challenging questions: 1) whether a Mexican national standing on the Mexican-side of the United States and Mexico border at the time of the alleged violation can avail himself of the protections of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution when a U.S. Border Patrol agent standing in the United States uses excessive force against him; and 2) whether a U.S. Border Patrol agent may assert qualified immunity based on facts he found out after the alleged violation.

Specifically before the Court are Plaintiff Araceli Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint ("FAC") (Doc. 18), Defendant Lonnie Swartz' Fed.R.Civ.P. Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 30), Rodriguez' Response (Doc. 46), and Swartz' Reply (Doc. 49). The Court heard oral arguments on this matter on May 26, 2015. For the reasons stated below, the Court grants in part and denies in part Swartz' Motion to Dismiss.

BACKGROUND

The Court sets forth the following factual background and hereby imparts that these statements are reiterations of Rodriguez' allegations which may or may not be a complete and accurate rendition of the facts of this case. See (Doc. 18). At this stage in the proceedings, Swartz has made no concessions as to the veracity of Rodriguez' allegations nor presented any contravening facts; such facts are not required when filing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.

1. Rodriguez brings this suit on behalf of her deceased minor son, J.A. (Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 3, 6).
2. On the night of October 10, 2012, J.A. was walking home alone down the sidewalk of Calle Internacional, a street that runs alongside the border fence on the Mexican side of the border between the United States and Mexico. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 9).
3. According to an eyewitness who was walking behind J.A. that night, a Border Patrol agent stationed on the U.S. side of the fence, now known to be Swartz, opened fire. According to various reports, Swartz fired anywhere from 14 to 30 shots. Upon information and belief, Swartz did not issue any verbal warnings before opening fire. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 10).

4. J.A. was shot approximately ten times and collapsed where he was shot. Virtually all of the shots entered his body from behind. Upon information and belief, no one else was shot. (Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 11-13).

5. Immediately prior to the shooting, J.A. was visible and not hiding—he was peacefully walking down the street by himself. Eyewitnesses state that he did not pose a threat and was not committing a crime, throwing rocks, using a weapon or threatening U.S. Border Patrol agents or anyone else prior to being shot. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 14).

6. At the moment he was shot, J.A. was walking on the southern side of Calle Internacional, directly across the street from a sheer cliff face that rises approximately 25 feet from street level. The cliff is approximately 30 feet from where J.A. was standing when shot. The border fence, which is approximately 20- 25 feet tall, runs along the top of the cliff. Thus, at the location where J.A. was shot, the top of the fence towards approximately 50 feet above street level on the Mexican side. The fence itself is made of steel beams that are 6.5 inches in diameter. Each beam is approximately 3.5 inches apart from the next. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 15).

7. At the time of the shooting, J.A. lived in Nogales, Sonora, Mexico, approximately four blocks from where he was shot. Because J.A's mother (Plaintiff, Araceli Rodriguez) was away for work, J.A.'s grandmother often visited Nogales, Mexico to care for him. J.A.'s grandmother and grandfather live in Arizona and were lawful permanent residents of the United States at the time of the shooting. They are now U.S. citizens. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 17).

8. Swartz fired from the U.S. side of the fence. Swartz acted under color of law when shooting J.A. Upon information and belief, Swartz did not know whether J.A. was a U.S. citizen or whether J.A. had any significant contacts with the United States. (Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 17, 19).

9. J.A.'s killing by Swartz is not a unique event, but part of a larger pattern of shootings by Border Patrol agents in Nogales and elsewhere. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 20).

10. 10.The U.S.-Mexico border area of Mexico is unlike other areas of Mexico. U.S. Border Patrol agents not only control the U.S. side of the fence, but through the use of force and assertion of authority, also exert control over the immediate area on the Mexican side, including where J.A. was shot. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 21).

11. 11.U.S. control of the Mexican side of the border fence in Nogales and other areas along the Southern border is apparent and longstanding, and recognized by persons living in the area. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 22).

12. 12.Border Patrol agents use guns, non-lethal devices and other weapons, as well as military equipment and surveillance devices to target persons on the Mexican side of the border. For example, U.S. surveillance cameras are mounted along the border fence, monitoring activity on the Mexican side of the fence. Additionally, Border Patrol agents have opened fire into Nogales from the U.S. side on prior occasions and are known to launch non-lethal devices such as pepper spray canisters into Nogales neighborhoods from the U.S. side of the border fence. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 23).

13. 13.U.S. Border Patrol agents exercise control over areas on the Mexican side of the border adjacent to the international border fence. U.S. Border Patrol agents make seizures on the Mexican side of the fence. U.S. Bureau of Customs and Border Protection officials are authorized to be on Mexican soil to conduct pre-inspection of those seeking admission to the United States. U.S. Border Patrol helicopters fly in Mexican airspace near the border and swoop down on individuals. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 24).

14. 14.The Chief of the U.S. Border Patrol has acknowledged that U.S. border security policy "extends [the United States'] zone of security outward, ensuring that our physical border is not the first or last line of defense, but one of many." Securing Our Borders—Operation Control and the Path Forward: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Border and Maritime Security of the H. Comm. on Homeland Security, 112th Cong. 8 (2011) (prepared by Michael J. Fisher, Chief of U.S. Border Patrol). (Doc. 18 at ¶ 24).

LEGAL STANDARD

"On a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a court must assess whether the complaint 'contains sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Chavez v. U.S., 683 F.3d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 2012) (citing Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678; Bell Atl. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007)). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. at 1108-09; see also Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 322- 23 (2007). In determining plausibility, the court must accept as true all material factual allegations in the complaint, construe the pleadings in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and make any reasonable inferences therefrom. Broam v. Bogan, 320 F.3d 1023, 1028 (9th Cir. 2003). A court may dismiss a claim if a successful affirmative defense appears clearly on the face of the pleadings. Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 215 (2007).

DISCUSSION

I. Bivens, the extraterritorial application of the U.S. Constitution and qualified immunity Rodriguez asserts her claims against Swartz in his individual capacity for deprivation of J.A.'s constitutional rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the United States Constitution. (Doc. 18 at p.8). See Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). In Bivens, the Supreme Court of the United States held that money damages may be recovered against a federal official for violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights. In order to successfully allege a Bivens claim, a plaintiff must plead factual matter demonstrating that he was deprived of a clearly established constitutional right. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 666.

Swartz argues that Rodriguez cannot state a claim that J.A. was deprived of a constitutional right because J.A., a Mexican citizen without substantial voluntary connections to the United States and standing on Mexican soil at the time of the alleged violation, is not entitled to the protections of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution. Should this Court hold that J.A. was protected by either or both Amendments, Swartz asserts that he is entitled to qualified immunity because J.A.'s rights pursuant to the Fourth or Fifth Amendments were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.

Rodriguez responds by arguing that this Court need not analyze this case as an extraterritorial application of the United States Constitution because Swartz' conduct took place entirely within the United States. Should the Court consider the extraterritorial application of the Constitution, Rodriguez asserts that J.A. was protected by both the Fourth and Fifth Amendments even while on Mexican soil. Rodriguez further avers that Swartz should not be entitled to qualified immunity because he knew it was a crime to fatally shoot a Mexican citizen across the border without justification, and because Swartz did not know J.A.'s legal status or citizenship when he shot J.A., such that qualified immunity should not apply post-hoc Swartz' awareness of J.A.'s citizenship.

II. Hernandez v. United States et al. is persuasive, not controlling, authority

The parties' arguments before this Court are framed in reference to Hernandez v. United States, 757 F.3d 249 (5th Cir. 2014), a case with very similar arguments to those now before the Court:

On June 7, 2010, Sergio Adrian Hernandez Guereca, a fifteen-year-old Mexican national, was on the Mexican side of a cement culvert that separates the United States from Mexico. Id. at 255. Sergio had been playing a game with his friends that involved running up the incline of the culvert, touching the barbed-wire fence separating Mexico and the United States, and then running back down the incline. Id. U.S. Border Patrol Agent Jesus Mesa, Jr. arrived on the scene and detained one of Sergio's friends, causing Sergio to retreat and hide behind the pillars of a bridge on the Mexican side of the border. Id. Mesa, still standing in the United States, then fired at least two shots at Sergio, one of which struck Sergio in the face and killed him. Id.

Sergio's parents filed suit against the United States, unknown federal employees, and Mesa. Id. Similarly to the case before this Court, the claim against Mesa was made pursuant to Bivens for violations Sergio's Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights through the use of excessive, deadly force. Id. Mesa moved to dismiss the claims against him asserting qualified immunity and arguing that Sergio, as an alien injured outside the United States, lacked Fourth or Fifth Amendment protections. Id. at 256. The U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas agreed and dismissed the claims against Mesa. Id. Sergio's parents appealed.

A divided three judge panel of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held that in Sergio's case when, "an alleged seizure occur[s] outside of [the U.S.] border and involving a foreign national—the Fourth Amendment does not apply." Id. at 267. Nevertheless, the panel majority also held "that a noncitizen injured outside the United States as a result of arbitrary official conduct by a law enforcement officer located in the United States may invoke the protections provided by the Fifth Amendment." Id. at 272. The panel further found that Bivens extends to an individual located abroad who asserts the Fifth Amendment right to be free from gross physical abuse against federal law enforcement agents located in the United States based on their conscience-shocking, excessive use of force across our nation's borders. Id. at 277. Finally, the panel held that the facts alleged in the complaint defeated Mesa's claim of qualified immunity stating: "It does not take a court ruling for an official to know that no concept of reasonableness could justify the unprovoked shooting of another person." Id. at 279-80 (citing Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002)).

Upon Mesa's motion, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to rehear Hernandez en banc. 771 F.3d 818 (5th Cir. 2014). In a per curiam decision, a unanimous Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's dismissal of both counts against Mesa holding that Sergio's parents failed to allege a violation of the Fourth Amendment, and that Sergio's Fifth Amendment rights were not "clearly established" when he was shot. Hernandez v. United States et al., --- F.3d --- (5th Cir. April 24, 2015); 2015 WL 1881566, at *1. In holding Sergio's Fifth Amendment rights were not "clearly established," the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals gave allegiance to the general rule of constitutional avoidance and bypassed the issue of whether Sergio was entitled to constitutional protection as a noncitizen standing on foreign soil. Id. at *2. At least three judges wrote concurring opinions on the matter—each attempting to reconcile and apply various Supreme Court holdings (including Johnson v. Eisentrager, 399 U.S. 763 (1950);Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957); United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990); and Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008)) to facts unique to the Fifth or any other circuit.

Swartz urges the Court to follow the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals' en banc decision and dismiss both of Rodriguez' claims based on theories of constitutional extraterritoriality and qualified immunity. Rodriguez avers that Hernandez was wrongly decided and holds no precedential value in this Circuit. The Court agrees that Hernandez is not controlling authority in this circuit. All the same, the Court has been guided by the thorough historical and legal analysis of the complex issues addressed in the Fifth Circuit Appellate judges' opinions and utilized the Hernandez decisions as a frame of reference. Nevertheless, while Hernandez shares many similar arguments to the case at hand, this Court evaluates Rodriguez' case on the facts alleged in her First Amended Complaint, on the arguments made by the parties' in their pleadings, and in light of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal's applicable and controlling case law. Applying this Circuit's case law to the facts of this specific case, this Court respectfully disagrees with the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals and arrives at a different conclusion as outlined below.

III. J.A.'s seizure occurred in Mexico

The Court begins with Rodriguez' contention that there is no need to analyze J.A.'s seizure as an extraterritorial application of the constitution because Swartz' conduct occurred entirely within the United States. To support her position, Rodriguez cites to use the language in footnote sixteen of Wang v. Reno, 81 F.3d 808, 818 n.16 (9th Cir. 1996) stating that the government's conduct in the United States can constitute a violation abroad. However, the Court in Wang clearly stated that "[t]he deprivation [of Wang's due process rights] occurred on American soil when Wang was forced to take the witness stand," and that the actions taken while Wang was abroad were "inextricably intertwined with the ultimate violation." Id. Such is not the same in the present case where the ultimate violation, J.A.'s seizure, occurred entirely in Mexico.

A seizure occurs "only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement..." Brower v. Cnty of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596-97 (1989). In this case, J.A. was not seized when Swartz shot at him, but when the bullets entered J.A.'s body and impeded further movement. As such, any constitutional violation that may have transpired materialized in Mexico. Accordingly, the Court now turns to the question of whether the Fourth and/or Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution protect J.A. outside the United States.[1]

IV. Rodriguez' claim that Swartz violated J.A.'s Fourth Amendment rights survives

A. Both Boumediene and Verdugo-Urquidez apply

The Supreme Court of the United States "has discussed the issue of the Constitution's extraterritorial application on many occasions." Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 755-71. However, it was not until 2008's Boumediene v. Bush that the Supreme Court held for the first time that noncitizens detained by the United States government in territory over which another country maintains de jure sovereignty have any rights under the United States Constitution. Id. at 771 (addressing whether the Suspension Clause has full effect at Naval Station in Guantanamo Bay in case where aliens detained as enemy combatants sought the Writ of Habeas Corpus).

[1] The Court also rejects as unpersuasive Rodriguez' argument pursuant to Asahi Metal Indus. Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., 480 U.S. 102, 113 (1987): that judicial proceedings, and therefore, any government actions that could violate the litigants' rights take place inside the United States. Asahi focused on when a state court could exercise personal jurisdiction over a foreign corporation. Jurisdiction is not at issue in this case.

In their pleadings, the parties disagree as to which standard the Court should apply to decide whether the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution apply in this case. Swartz argues that Boumediene is limited to the Suspension Clause and inapplicable in the present case. Further, Swartz avers that the "voluntary connections" test announced in Verdugo-Urquidez' controls Rodriguez' Fourth Amendment claim. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. at 261, 271 (holding that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to the search and seizure by United States agents of property owned by a nonresident and located in a foreign country where nonresident had no voluntary connection to the United States). Rodriguez responds that Verdugo-Urquidez' "voluntary connections" test was repudiated by the Supreme Court in Boumediene where the Court applied a "general functional approach" and "impracticable and anomalous" standard when determining the extraterritoriality of the United States Constitution. 553 U.S. at 755-72.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals grappled with this very question in addressing Hernandez and decided to apply Verdugo-Urquidez' "sufficient connections requirement" in light of Boumediene's "general functional approach" as to the Fourth Amendment claim. Hernandez, 757 F.3d at 266. In arriving at this conclusion, the Fifth Circuit Court of appeals rejected 1) Defendant Mesa's argument that the Constitution does not guarantee rights to foreign nationals injured outside the sovereign territory of the United States, 2) the district court's finding that Boumediene was limited to the Suspension Clause, and 3) the plaintiffs' argument that the Court should ignore Verdugo- Urquidez in light of Boumediene. Id. at 260, 262, and 265. Applying both standards, the appellate court considered the fact that Hernandez lacked: American citizenship, territorial presence in the United States, interest in entering the United States, acceptance of societal obligations, and sustained connections to the United States. Id. Additionally, the Court weighed several practical considerations in determining whether Hernandez was protected by the Fourth Amendment including the uniqueness of the border. Id. at 266-67 (discussing the limited application of the Fourth Amendment during searches at the border, national self-protection interests, the increase of Border Patrol agents at the southwest border, and the use of sophisticated surveillance systems). Ultimately, the appellate court found that Hernandez was not entitled to the protections of the Fourth Amendment based on the facts alleged.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals similarly determined that both Boumediene's "functional approach" factors and Verdugo-Urquidez' "significant voluntary connection" test applied in the case of a woman seeking to assert her rights under the First and Fifth Amendments of the United States Constitution. Ibrahim v. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 669 F.3d 983, 994-97 (9th Cir. 2012). The Court found a comparison of Ibrahim's case with Verdugo-Urquidez, Eisentrager, and Boumediene instructive in rejecting the government's bright-line "formal sovereignty-based" test and in holding that the plaintiff had established voluntary connections to the United States during her studies at an American university. Id. at 995-97. Similarly, this Court finds an analysis of these cases instructive in finding that both Boumediene's functional approach factors and Verdugo- Urquidez "voluntary connections" test apply in this case.

In 1950's Eisentrager, the Supreme Court of the United States found that German citizens who had been arrested in China, convicted of violating the laws of war

after adversary trials before a U.S. military tribunal in China, and sent to a prison in Germany to serve their sentences did not have the right to seek the Writ of Habeas Corpus under the United States Constitution. 339 U.S. at 770-77 (considering (a) petitioners' status as enemy aliens; (b) lack of previous territorial presence or residence in the United States; (c) capture and custody by U.S. military as prisoners of war; (d) convictions by Military Commission sitting outside the United States; (e) for offenses against laws of war committed outside the United States; and (f) at all times imprisoned outside the United States.)

In 1990's Verdugo-Urquidez, a Mexican-national was extradited from Mexico to face drug charges in the United States. 494 U.S. at 262. While awaiting trial, American law enforcement agents working with Mexican authorities performed a warrantless search of Verdugo-Urquidez' Mexican residences and seized various incriminating documents. Id. The criminal defendant sought to suppress this evidence and alleged violations of his Fourth Amendment rights. Id. at 263. The Supreme Court of the United States considered the text and history of the Fourth Amendment, as well as Supreme Court cases discussing the application of the Constitution to aliens extraterritorially. The Supreme Court found that under the circumstances (where Verdugo-Urquidez was a citizen and resident of Mexico with no voluntary attachment to the United States and the place to be searched was located in Mexico), the Fourth Amendment had no application. Id. at 274-75. Concurring in the opinion, Justices Kennedy and Stevens each wrote separately to address the fact that applying the Warrant Clause to searches of noncitizens' homes in foreign jurisdictions would be impractical and anomalous due to practical considerations. Id. at 275-79.

In 2008's Boumediene, the plaintiffs were aliens who had been designated as enemy combatants, were detained at the United States Naval Station in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and sought the Writ of Habeas Corpus. 553 U.S. at 732. The government argued that because of their status as enemy combatants and their physical location outside the sovereignty of the United States, they had no constitutional rights and no privilege to Habeas Corpus. Id. at 739. The Supreme Court rejected the government's argument instead finding that "questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." Id. at 764. In so holding, Boumediene addressed both Eisentrager and Verdugo-Urquidez and found both of these decisions to stand for the proposition that the extraterritorial reach of the constitution depends upon "practical considerations" including the "particular circumstances, the practical necessities, and the possible alternatives which Congress had before it" and in particular, whether judicial enforcement of the provision would be "impracticable and anomalous." Id. at 759-66.

In Ibrahim, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit considered that Ibrahim was unlike the plaintiffs in Eisentrager—she had not been convicted of, or even charged with violations of any law. 669 F.3d at 996. On the other hand, Ibrahim shared an important similarity with the plaintiffs in Boumediene—she sought the right to assert constitutional claims in a civilian court in order to correct what she contended was a mistake. Id. at 997. Here, J.A. was also unlike the plaintiffs in Eisentrager—he had not been charged with or convicted of violating any law. Similarly to the plaintiffs in Boumediene, J.A. was on foreign soil when he was seized by American forces and now seeks to assert that his seizure was unlawful. Per this Circuit's precedent in Ibrahim and the Supreme Court's reasoning in Boumediene, this Court sees no reason why Boumediene should not apply in this case. Because Verdugo-Urquidez has not been overruled and considers the Fourth Amendment explicitly, this Court finds that it must also apply the "voluntary connections" test. In sum, this Court finds most appropriate to apply the "practical considerations" outlined in Boumediene in conjunction with Verdugo-Urquidez' "voluntary connections" test to evaluate whether J.A. was protected by the Fourth Amendment.

B. The facts alleged in this case weigh in favor of establishing that J.A. was entitled to the protections of the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution

The Supreme Court stated three factors relevant to determining the extraterritorial application of the Constitution (specifically the Suspension Clause) in Boumediene: (1) the citizenship and status of the claimant, (2) the nature of the location where the constitutional violation occurred, and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in enforcing the claimed right. 553 U.S. at 766-71. The relevant obstacles included, but were not limited to, the consequences for U.S. actions abroad, the substantive rules that would govern the claim, and the likelihood that a favorable ruling would lead to friction with another country's government. Id. at 766. The Court considers these along with the "voluntary connections" test outlined in Verdugo-Urquidez to find that Rodriguez can assert J.A.'s rights pursuant to the Fourth Amendment.

To begin, the Court considers J.A.'s citizenship, status, and voluntary connections to the United States. J.A. was a sixteen-year-old Mexican citizen. See Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 1-2. At the time Swartz seized him, J.A. was not suspected of, charged with, or convicted of violating any law. Just prior to the shooting, J.A. was visible and not hiding. Id. at ¶14. Observers stated that he did not pose a threat, but was peacefully walking down the street. Id. He was not committing a crime, nor was he throwing rocks, using a weapon, or in any way threatening U.S. Border Patrol agents or anyone else. Id. Further, J.A. was not a citizen of a country with which the United States are at war, nor was he engaged in an act of war or any act that would threaten the national security of the United States. Id. Thus, J.A.'s status was that of a civilian foreign national engaged in a peaceful activity in another country, but within the U.S.'s small-arms power to seize. The Court here finds that while J.A.'s nationality weighs against granting him protection pursuant to the Fourth Amendment, his status as a civilian engaged in peaceful activity weighs in favor of granting him protection despite the fact that J.A. was in the territory of another country when he was seized.

As to substantial voluntary connections to the United States, this Court finds that J.A. had at least one. J.A. and his family lived within the region formerly called "ambos Nogales," or "both Nogales," referring to the adjacent towns of Nogales, Arizona and Nogales, Sonora—once adjacent cities flowing into one-another, now divided by a fence. Id. at ¶ 17. In particular, J.A. had strong familial connections to the United States. Both his grandparents were legal permanent residents (now citizens) of the United States residing in Nogales, Arizona. Id. J.A.'s grandmother would often cross the border into Mexico to care for J.A. while his mother worked. Id. Further, J.A.'s home in Nogales, Sonora, Mexico was within four blocks' distance from the U.S.-Mexico border. Id. Living in such proximity to this country, J.A. was likely well-aware of the United States' (and specifically the U.S. Border Patrol's) de facto control and influence over Nogales, Sonora, Mexico. Id. at ¶¶ 17, 21-24.

The Court here considers these same factors in assessing the nature of the location where the alleged constitutional violation occurred.[2] Specifically, the Court considers Rodriguez' factual allegations that the U.S.-Mexico border is unlike other areas of Mexico. Id. at ¶¶ 21-24. "U.S. Border Patrol agents not only control the U.S. side of the fence, but through the use of force and assertion of authority, they also exert control over the immediate area on the Mexican side, including where J.A. was shot." Id. at ¶ 21. "U.S. control of the Mexican side of the border fence in Nogales and other areas along the Southern border is apparent and longstanding, and recognized by persons living in this area." Id. at ¶ 22. "Border patrol agents use guns, non-lethal devices and other weapons, as well as military equipment and surveillance devices to target persons on the Mexican side of the border....Border Patrol agents have opened fire into Nogales from the U.S. side on prior occasions and are known to launch non-lethal devices such as pepper spray canisters into Nogales neighborhoods from the U.S. side of the border fence. By shooting individuals on the Mexican side of the border area, the United States, through Border Patrol, controls the area immediately adjacent to the international border fence on the Mexican side. This control extended to the street, Calle Internacional, where J.A. was killed." Id. at ¶ 23. The Court finds this factor to weigh in favor of granting

[2] See Hernandez v. United States, 757 F.3d 249, 267 (5th Cir. 2014) (outlining the scope of the U.S. Border Patrol's presence and influence along the U.S.'s southwest border with Mexico.) See also Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 754 ("Our cases do not hold it is improper for us to inquire into the objective degree of control the Nation asserts over foreign territory.")

J.A. constitutional protection pursuant to the Fourth Amendment.

The Court also considers the practical obstacles inherent in enforcing the claimed right. These considerations include the nature of the right asserted, the context in which the claim arises, and whether recognition of the right would create conflict with a foreign sovereign's laws and customs. Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 755-65. The nature of the right asserted here is the right to be free from unreasonable seizures—specifically, the fundamental right to be free from the United States government's arbitrary use of deadly force. See Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 35-38. The claim here arises as a lawsuit in a United States court and asks that this court apply U.S. constitutional law to the actions of a U.S. Border Patrol agent firing his weapon from within the United States. Id. at ¶¶ 4-5.; Cf. Boumediene, 553 U.S. at 759-64 (discussing practical considerations of providing plaintiffs with ability to assert their rights abroad). Rodriguez has provided documentation from the Mexican government such that there would be no conflict with Mexico's laws and customs if this Court afforded J.A. protection under the Fourth Amendment. See Doc. 46-1. The Court finds that these factors weigh in favor of granting J.A. protection under the Fourth Amendment.

Finally, the Court gives weight to the Supreme Court's concerns in Verdugo- Urquidez—that applying the Fourth Amendment to the warrantless search and seizure of a Mexican national's home in Mexico "could significantly disrupt the ability of the political branches to respond to foreign situations involving our national interest" and could also plunge U.S. law enforcement and military agents "into a sea of uncertainty as to what might be reasonable in the way of searches and seizures conducted abroad." 494 U.S. at 273-74; see also Hernandez, 757 F.3d at 267 (noting that extending the Fourth Amendment protections to a Mexican national on Mexican soil might carry a host of implications for U.S. Border Patrol's use of sophisticated surveillance systems (including mobile surveillance units, thermal imaging systems, unmanned aircrafts and other large- and small-scale non-intrusive inspection equipment per, Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 40 (2001))).

The Court here finds that such concerns are ameliorated by the fact that this case does not involve the Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment, magistrate judges, or the issuance of warrants and/or the searches and seizure of property abroad. This case addresses only the use of deadly force by U.S. Border Patrol agents in seizing individuals at and near the United States-Mexico border. U.S. Border Patrol agents are already trained in the limits of the Fourth Amendment when addressing citizens and non-citizens alike when these individuals place foot within the United States. See, e.g. 8 C.F.R. § 287.8(a)(2). These agents would require no additional training to determine when it is appropriate to use deadly force against individuals (whether citizens or noncitizens alike) located on the Mexican side of the United States-Mexico border.

Weighing all of the aforementioned factors, this Court finds that J.A. was entitled to protection pursuant to the Fourth Amendment. The Court acknowledges that it has arrived at a different conclusion from that of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Hernandez v. U.S., 757 F.3d at 267. This Court respectfully disagrees with how the Circuit Court weighed some factors, but bases its decision to extend J.A. protection pursuant to the Fourth Amendment on the facts alleged in Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint and this Court's own analysis of the relevant case law. (Doc. 18). At its heart, this is a case alleging excessive deadly force by a U.S. Border Patrol agent standing on American soil brought before a United States Federal District Court tasked with upholding the United States Constitution—that the deceased was a Mexican national standing on Mexican soil at the time the violation occurred is but one of the many practical considerations and factors the Supreme Court of the United States has ordered the lower courts to consider. Pursuant to the facts presented before this Court in Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint, the factors outlined in Verdugo-Urquidez and Boumediene weigh in favor of extending J.A. constitutional protection pursuant to the Fourth Amendment.

V. Rodriguez' claim pursuant to the Fifth Amendment is dismissed

Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint alleges that Swartz' actions violated J.A.'s Fifth Amendment guarantee of substantive due process. In his motion to dismiss, Swartz alleges that Rodriguez' Fifth Amendment claim is improperly before this Court as a substantive due process violation that is best analyzed pursuant to the Fourth Amendment.

In fact, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that "all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure' of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its 'reasonableness' standard, rather than under a 'substantive due process' approach." Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989); see also Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 273 (1994); Cnty. of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 843 (1998). "Because the Fourth Amendment provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection against this sort of physically intrusive governmental conduct, that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of 'substantive due process,' must be the guide for analyzing these claims." Id.

Finding both that J.A. was 'seized' and that his excessive force claim pursuant to the Fourth Amendment may proceed, this Court hereby grants Swartz' motion to dismiss Rodriguez' claim pursuant to the Fifth Amendment because Swartz conduct is more properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. In dismissing Rodriguez' Fifth Amendment claim, this Court does not reach Rodriguez' argument that J.A. should be entitled to protection under the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against arbitrary deprivation of life if this Court were to find that the Fourth Amendment did not protect J.A. See Doc. 46 at pp. 21-22.

VI. Swartz is not entitled to qualified immunity

Qualified immunity "gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments," and "protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'" Messerchmidt v. Millender, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 1244-45, citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2085 (2011) (quoting Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341 (1986)). "[W]hether an official protected by qualified immunity may be held personally liable for an allegedly unlawful official action generally runs on the 'objective legal reasonableness' of the action, assessed in light of the legal rules that were 'clearly established' at the time it was taken." Id.

Courts are to analyze this question from the perspective "of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight" and thus allow "for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation." Graham, 490 U.S. at 396.

Qualified immunity is not merely a defense. Rather, it provides a sweeping protection from the entirety of the litigation process. Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 819 (1982). Indeed, qualified immunity guards against the "substantial social costs, including the risk that fear of personal monetary liability and harassing litigation will unduly inhibit officials in the discharge of their duties." Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 638 (1987). When law enforcement officers are sued for their conduct in the line of duty, courts must balance between "the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably." Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 231 (2009).

Judges are to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances of the particular case. Id. at 236. The first inquiry is whether the facts demonstrate that the defendant officer violated one or more of plaintiff's constitutional rights. Id. If the answer is "no," the matter is concluded because without a violation there is no basis for plaintiff's lawsuit to proceed. Id. If the answer is "yes," the court must decide whether the right at issue was "clearly established" at the time of the alleged misconduct. Id. at 232. A right is clearly established where "it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted." Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004) (citations omitted). Qualified immunity is only applicable where both prongs are satisfied. Pearson, 555 U.S. at 232.

Having previously found that J.A. was protected by the Fourth Amendment, the two questions remaining before the Court are 1) whether the FAC alleges sufficient facts to establish the plausibility that Swartz violated J.A.'s constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizures and 2) whether the right was clearly established at the time of the violation. Both of these questions are to be analyzed accepting facts alleged in Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint as true and making all reasonable inferences in favor of Rodriguez. Accordingly, the Court finds that Rodriguez alleges sufficient facts to establish the plausibility that Swartz violated J.A.'s Fourth Amendment rights. Further, the Court finds that J.A.'s rights were clearly established when Swartz seized him such that Swartz is not entitled to assert qualified immunity.

Over thirty years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States established that law enforcement officers could not use deadly force on an unarmed suspect to prevent his escape. Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 203 (2004) (J. Breyer concurring) ("The constitutional limits on the use of deadly force have been clearly established for almost two decades. In 1985 [the Supreme Court of the United States] held that the killing of an unarmed burglar to prevent his escape was an unconstitutional seizure.") (citing Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985)). This means that for over thirty years, law enforcement officers have been well-aware that it is unlawful (and in violation of an individual's Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable seizures) to use deadly force against an unarmed suspect to prevent his escape. Additionally, officers are also aware that in "obvious cases" rights can be "clearly established" even without a body of relevant case law. See Hope, 536 U.S. at 738 (citing U.S. v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 270- 271 (1997)).

The facts alleged in the First Amended Complaint are that J.A. was peacefully walking home and was not engaged in the violation of any law or threatening anyone when Swartz shot him at least ten times. (Doc. 18 at ¶¶ 10, 14). As alleged in Rodriguez' First Amended Complaint, this is not a case involving circumstances where Swartz needed to make split-second judgment—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation. Instead, the facts alleged in the First Amended Complaint, demonstrate an "obvious case" where it is clear that Swartz had no reason to use deadly force against J.A.

Swartz attempts to differentiate this case from other deadly force cases by alleging that at the time he shot J.A., it was not clearly established whether the United States Constitution applied extraterritorially to a non-citizen standing on foreign soil. Yet, at the time he shot J.A., Swartz was an American law enforcement officer standing on American soil and well-aware of the limits on the use of deadly force against U.S. citizens and non-citizens alike within the United States. See, e.g. 8 C.F.R. § 287.8(a)(2). What Swartz did not know at the time he shot was whether J.A. was a United States citizen or the citizen of a foreign country, and if J.A. had significant voluntary connections to the United States. (Doc. 18 at ¶ 17). It was only after Swartz shot J.A. and learned of J.A.'s identity as a Mexican national that he had any reason to think he might be entitled to qualified immunity.[3] This Court finds that Swartz may not assert qualified immunity based on J.A.'s status where Swartz learned of J.A.'s status as a non-citizen after the violation. See Moreno v. Baca, 431 F.3d 633, 641 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding that "police officers cannot retroactively justify a suspicionless search and arrest on the basis of an after-the-fact discovery of an arrest warrant or a parole violation").[4]

This holding again contravenes that of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Hernandez v. United States, --- F.3d --- (2015), 2015 WL 1881566. This Court respectfully disagrees with the en banc panel's decision that "any properly asserted right was not clearly established to the extent the law requires." Id. at *2. In part, this may be because this Court does not characterize the question before the Court as "whether the general prohibition of excessive force applies where a person injured by a U.S. official standing on U.S. soil is [3] Had Swartz subsequently found that J.A. was a citizen of the United States, he could not challenge that the Constitution applied to J.A. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957) (applying the Constitution to U.S. citizens abroad). Similarly, Swartz could not argue that the Constitution did not apply to legal permanent residents and perhaps even undocumented aliens who had established substantial voluntary connections with the United States. See Ibrahim, 669 F.3d at 994-95. Further, had J.A. been situated some thirty-five feet north in the territory of the United States, there would be no question that he would be protected by the Constitution. Id.

[4] Again, the Court does not reach Rodriguez' arguments that the Fifth Amendment applies if the Fourth Amendment does not. See Doc. 46 at 21-22. Similarly, the Court does not reach the question of whether J.A.'s Fifth Amendment rights were violated or clearly established when he was seized by Swartz.

an alien who had no significant voluntary connection to, and was not in, the United States when the incident occurred." Id. Instead, this Court focuses on whether an agent may assert qualified immunity on an after-the-fact discovery that the individual he shot was not a United States citizen; this Court concludes that qualified immunity may not be asserted in this manner.

VII. Conclusion

The Court finds that, under the facts alleged in this case, the Mexican national may avail himself to the protections of the Fourth Amendment and that the agent may not assert qualified immunity.

In addressing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, this Court must accept as true all material factual allegations in the complaint, construe the pleadings in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and make any reasonable inferences therefrom. Applying this standard, Rodriguez has stated a claim upon which relief can be granted. J.A. was entitled to the protections of the Fourth Amendment, even as a non-citizen standing on foreign soil pursuant to both his substantial voluntary connections to the United States and Boudemeine's functional approach in addressing his claim. Because Rodriguez' claim of excessive force should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, this Court dismisses Rodriguez' Fifth Amendment claim. Finally, Swartz cannot assert qualified immunity when he found out after-the-fact that he had exerted deadly force upon a noncitizen. Accordingly,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED granting in part and denying part Swartz' Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 30). Rodriguez' claim pursuant to the Fifth Amendment is dismissed; Rodriguez' claim pursuant to the Fourth Amendment proceeds.
